A Thrilling Sketch.

A Lady's Account of An Indian Attack

One warm day in August, upon the bank of the muddy Colorado, we children were lazily sitting about on the ground. One sister was stringing beads taken from an old moccasin, and most of the men were sleeping under the wagons through the heat of the afternoon. There was a great stillness upon everything, save for the children's chatter, and a heat rose from the ground that smote the eyes. Suddenly there was a dreadful scream, echoed, re-echoed, multiplied; then another, and another, as when one strikes the hand upon the mouth, till in one second of the time the air seemed rent and torn with yells. In just that second the close chapparal had become black with Indians, who had crawled, serpent-like, on hands and knees, till, right upon us, in concert they could leap into sight. They wore cloths upon their loins, and had some feathers wound in their hair, with hideous paint glowing on cheek and breast. I gazed in dumb amazement, benumbed with surprise, and then I think I awoke to the excitement of the occasion. The women and children, through an air thick with flying arrows, were marshalled into one covered wagon, and there my mother wrapped us all round with feather beds, blankets and comforters. I do not think I was frightened, not because of any precocity of courage, but because of a wild excitement that filled me. I half leaned upon the knee of my sister. She said she was conscious of no pain, she felt no sudden pang, but something warm seemed running down her side, and, looking down, she saw an arrow which had pierced her flesh and protruded its flinty head from the wound. "Mother," she exclaimed, "I am shot," and fainted. My mother, the women whose spirit never failed her in this or the dreadful trials which succeded this disasterous fight, put forth her hand and drew the arrow backward through the wound. It was while thus supporting the head of the girl she supposed dying, it somehow became known to her that her husband was lying quite dead and filled with arrows under the great cotton-wood tree round which the camp was made. It was but a few moments more till one of the men spoke from the front of the wagon. Said he: "Our ammunition is given out and we do not know but it may come to a hand-to-hand fight. Get out the knives you have in the bed of the wagon." Through the backward march which followed it was even the women who rose superior to suffering and to danger. The men lost courage, hope and spirit, but the women never. A few moments after the demand for the knives, a Methodist preacher, who had seized my father's rifle, aimed at the chief with the dinner bell depending from his belt, and saw him fall. In five minutes not an Indian was to be seen, the living dragged with them the dead as they went. In the meantime, under cover of the fight, our great herd of cattle had been made to swim the river, and were safely corraled in the Mojave villages.

The Abuse of Trees.

A VIGOROUS PROTEST FROM THOMAS HUGHES AGAINST FOREST DESECRATION.

(Tennessee Letter to London Spectator.)

There are few more interesting experiences than a ride through these southern forests. The scrub is so low and thin that you can almost always see away for long distances among pine, white oak and chestnut trees; and every now and then at ridges where the timber is thin, or where a clump of trees has been ruthlessly "girdled" and the bare, gaunt skeletons only remain standing, you may catch glimpses of mountain ranges of different shades of blue and green, stretching far away to the horizon. You can't live many days up here without getting to love the trees even more, I think, than we do in well-kempt England; and this outrage of "girdling," as they call it—stripping the bark from the lower part of the trunk, so that the trees wither and die as they stand—strikes one as a kind of household cruelty, as if a man should cut off or disfigure all his wife's hair. If he wants a tree for lumber or firewood, very good. He should have it. But he should cut it down like a man and take it clean away for some reasonable use, not leave it as a scarecrow to bear witness of his recklessness and laziness. Happily not much mischief of this kind has been done yet in the neighbourhood of Rugby, and a stop will now be put to the wretched practice. There is another, too, almost as ghastly, but which, no doubt, has more to be said for it. At least half of the largest pines alongside of the sandy tracks which do duty for roads have a long, gaping wound in their sides, about a yard from the ground. This was the native way of collecting turpentine, which oozed down and accumulated at the bottom of the gash; but I rejoice to say it no longer pays, and the custom is in disuse. It must be suppressed altogether, but carefully and gently. It seems that, if not persisted in too long, the poor, dear, long suffering trees will close up their wound, and not be much the worse; so I trust that many of the scored pines, springing 40 or 50 feet in the air before throwing out a branch, which I passed in sorrow and anger on my first long ride, may yet outlive those who outraged them. Having got rid of my spleen, excited by those two diabolic customs, I can return to our ride, which had otherwise nothing but delight in it.

STEAM POWER.—The combined force of the steam-engines of the world is estimated at 46,000,000 horse power. This is considered equal to about twice the available working power of the entire human population of the globe.

Sonnets.

BY JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER.

REQUIREMENT.

We live by Faith; but Faith is not the slave
Of text and legend. Reason's voice and God's,
Nature's and Duty's never are at odds.
What asks our Father of His children save
Justice and mercy and humility,
A reasonable service of good deeds,
Pure living, tenderness to human needs,
Reverence and trust, and prayer for light to see
The Master's footprints in our daily ways?
No knotted scourge, nor sacrificial knife,
But the calm beauty of an ordered life
Whose very breathing is unworded praise—
A life that stands, as all true lives have stood,
Fast rooted in the faith that God is Good.

HELP.

Dream not, O soul! that easy is the task
Thus set before thee. If it proves, at length,
As well it may, beyond thy natural strength,
Doubt not, despair not. As a child may ask
A father, pray the Everlasting Good
For light and guidance 'midst the subtle snares
Of sin, thick-planted in life's thoroughfares,
For spiritual nerve and moral hardihood,
Still listening 'midst the noises round about
Of time and sense, the Inward-speaking Word,
Bitter in blame, sweet in approval heard,
Piercing the tumult of the world without;
To health of soul a voice to cheer and please,
To guilt the wrath of the Eumenides!

UTTERANCE.

But what avail inadequate words to touch
The innermost of Truth? Shall I essay,
Blinded and weak, to point and lead the way,
Or grasp a theme for angels overmuch?
Yet if it be that something not my own,
Some shadows of the Thought to which our schemes
And creeds and rituals are uncertain dreams,
Is even to my unworthiness made known,
I may not hide what yet I scarcely dare
To utter, lest on doubtful lips of mine
The real seem false, the fitness less divine.
So through the pauses of an inward prayer,
I owe the faith which seems the simple truth
At evening time, as in the dawn of youth.

WOMAN GOSSIP.

Fashion Notes.

Spanish lace, beaded with gold, will be worn.

None but foreigners and provincials go to masked balls in Paris.

Golden nomie-cloth forms part of very handsome satin evening dresses.

Shirring is used to excess whenever the material is satin for ball dresses.

White satin with gold brocade is a fashionable choice for trained ball dresses.

Fancy-coloured, embroidered, and open drawn-worked table-linen is all the rage.

Cream, ecru, and buff cloths are most in favour for luncheon and breakfast tables.

The small cuff fitting inside the sleeve is at present the only style that will sell.

Pink tulle, trimmed with hollyberries without leaves, is a new fancy for ball toilets.

Dark-red hollyberries are very effective on simple tarlatan dresses of pure white.

A great deal of skill is expended at present upon paper knives and paper folders.

So much lace is worn now-a-days that a lady's lace box is rather an imposing structure.

Pretty trifles, holiday presents, are sleeve buttons and scarfpins, hand-painted on pearl, after the manner of costly dress buttons.

A Parisian fancy is for brown tulle ball dresses, trimmed with pink roses and buds.

Gold and amber fringes and embroideries appear on many handsome evening dresses.

Flowers have been excluded from winter bonnets, and feathers have taken their place.

Paris, at the present moment, has a craze for old brocades, old-stuffs, and old embroideries.

Tea caddies, with decorations in coloured alloys, becomes things of beauty as well as of use.

Floral decorations for ball dresses are made brilliant with golden stamens, pistils, and tendrils.

Dull, coppery-looking silver is in higher favour for table use than that which retains its natural colour.

The entire corsage of golden nomie-cloth is frequently worn with gold-embroidered and decorated satin skirts.

Artistic embroidery in colours and the open pattern of drawn-work ornament the finest table-linen this winter.

A pink veil is bad, a speckled veil is worse, and a pink speckled veil has happily been compared to the scarlet fever.

White or pale-tinted satins, brocaded with gold, form the trains of dresses intended for occasions of great ceremony.

It is the fashion now for ladies to decorate the silk lining of hoods with hand-painted flowers, roses, tulips, pansies and the like.

Gold trimmings in the form of embroideries, gold beads, fringes, tassels, and braids, are used on heavy white satin for ball dresses.

The silk and satin pincushions prepared for Christmas gifts are embroidered or painted. They are too handsome to be used for pins.

Gypsy bonnets, with long brims in front tapering to almost nothing in the back, bid fair to take the place of the Fachon or bebe bonnets.

One train to a gown is as much as most ladies can manage, but two trains, like those on a recent wedding dress in Paris, must have a tendency to collide.

Some of the new collarettes have bows, behind which a small woman is so absolutely hidden that she appears to be simply an appendage of the bow.

Jersey walking jackets of diagonal cloth come in black and various dark shades for promenade and carriage wear. They are pretty when perfectly fitted to the form.

On some of the napkins the outline figures are embroidered in groups representing Chinese tea-drinking scenes, or else cups and saucers that show the familiar willow design.

Hats are large and rather heavy, though they are exceedingly picturesque in the majority of instances. Long ostrich plumes are the principal trimmings of the several shapes worn.

This illustration represents the "Diana" basque made of ocean blue plush, to complete a short costume of plush and brocaded satin. The collar, cuffs, and revers are of blue satin brocaded in two shades. The basque is closed with two rows of enameled Watteau buttons. Shirred guimpe of India muslin edged with lace in the neck, and plaitings to match in the sleeves.

Arsenic Eating.

"Do you see that lady?" said a prominent chemist of Cleveland to a reporter of The Leader. "As sure as the sun will rise tomorrow, so surely will that woman die prematurely, in a few years, by a slow but certain self-destruction."

The scene was on Superior street, and the lady in question was standing on the sidewalk, waiting for one of the cars. The afternoon sun shone full upon her, dress and tout ensemble marked her as wealthy and refined, and her face was beautiful, but about the large gray eyes there was a wearied, troubled expression, and the marble face was almost death-like in its palor. The skin was translucent, showing the delicate blue veins beneath. It was perfectly pure and clear, but unnatural. Accepting an invitation to step into the chemist's labratory, the reporter was soon seated in a spacious room surrounded by thousands of bottles of all shapes and sizes, and the conversation turned again on the woman seen on the street.

"That lady," said the chemist seriously, "is an arsenic eater. Few have any idea how the deadly habit is spreading. Even in this city it numbers its devotees by hundreds, and the husband who prides himself on his wife's beautiful complexion, the father who presses the forehead of his daughter, and the lover who is proud of, while he is anxious about the transparent complexion of his sweetheart, never dreams for a moment that it is an unnatural effect produced by the use of a poison which would sooner or later destroy life. I am not telling this for sensation; it is a terrible truth, and I could sit down and write off a list of five hundred names of ladies who are in the habit of using this drug regularly. I could startle this city by telling it that women of many of its best families are committing a slow suicide. A practical chemist can tell at a glance a person addicted to this vice, and it has been my custom for years past to note down the persons I meet who have the mark of the arsenic habit upon them. If I were to show you that list you would be astonished."

"How is the drug usually taken?"

"Sometimes pure, in minute doses, but generally in the form of Fowler's solution. For the first few months, maybe in some cases for a year, little or no effects ensue, but after that time the beautiful pallor which you have seen is produced. After a few years the woman begins to feel her health giving way, and decides to discontinue its use. Alas, it is too late! The face changes to a livid red; every one notices it, and in despair she returns to the same course, and receives the congratulations of her friends on her restored health. After some years, however, the face gradually changes from the clear color of alabaster to a dull, ghastly complexion like chalk; the whole system, saturated with this mineral, gives way, and usually death mercifully ends a life of paralysis. Such has been the history of many of our wives and daughters, and unless the strong arm of the law steps in and puts stringent rules on the sale of this poison, it will be the history of the present rising generation.

High Heels.

A London doctor has been protesting in the Lancet against the fashionable, high-heeled shoes of women. He says: I have at present under my care two serious cases of "sprained ankle," solely arising from their use. The parties tripped, and, loosing their balance, were unable to recover themselves without falling, which in the one resulted in partial disability. Again, about a month since, I was consulted respecting a young lady, aged 16, whose parents were greatly alarmed at a supposed spinal affection, under which they believed their daughter to be suffering. I ordered the boots she generally wore to be brought to me, and found the heels raised two inches, tapering to the size of a shilling, and, to make matters worse, instead of corresponding to the situation of the natural heel, they were situated immediately under the arch of the foot. I recommended rest in the horizontal position for two or three days, and shoes with half-inch heels, of the breadth of the natural heel, and the toes broad in proportion, to be substituted for those previously worn. The cure was complete. No nausea, no weariness, no pain or discomfort, after a four-mile walk, have been experienced since. In walking under the previous condition every intention of nature—anatomically speaking—was fusterated, and the symptoms complained of precisely those to be expected. Not only were the firmness of step and ease in walking lost, through the natural spring and muscular action of the foot being destroyed, but every muscle whose tendons extended to the foot must have been abnormally strained, the upright position of the body preserved under difficulties, and the centre of gravity and adjacent nerve-centers seriously irritated—a state of things which, I need not tell my professional brethren, if perpetuated from youth to womanhood, must inevitably end in permanent mischief of some kind; and the sooner the voice of the profession is raised against such an absurd and pernicious practice, the better.

Woman Suffrage.

The agitation for woman suffrage is kept warm in England. Four great meetings of Englishwomen have been held during the last ten months, the first in February at Manchester, the second in May at London, the third early in November at Bristol, and the fourth at the close of the same month at Nottingham. At the last meeting Mrs. Lucas, sister of John Bright, presided, and Miss Helen Taylor, moved the adoption of a memorial to Mr. Gladstone; showing "that there are over 500,000 rate-payers in the united kingdom deprived of the power of voting in the election of members of parliament, on the sole ground that they are women. That this exclusion is directly opposed to the fundamental principle of representative government, and, therefore, unjust to such rate-payers. That the exclusion of women rate-payers from the exercise of the parliamentary vote deprives women of that free expression of opinion which is the only guaranty of liberty in the state. Wherefore, your memoralists pray that a measure may be introduced by her majesty's ministers to extend the parliamentary franchise to women rate-payers and land-owners in boroughs and counties.

A Paris Romance.

Near Paris a peasant girl was deserted by her lover, who had promised to marry. Some time afterward he called and found her washing clothes in the garden, near a well. They had been chatting a while, when suddenly the girl, as if by accident, dropped a cloth in the well, and exhibited great grief over the loss of it. Her companion volunteered to lean over in the well and fish the garment out: but while he was so engaged the girl caught him by the legs and threw him in. In reply to his cries, she told him if he would promise to marry her she would pull him out. He promised, but no sooner was he out than he brought a suit against her for trying to murder him. Then at last he withdrew it and married her.

PEARLS OF TRUTH.

It is the fear of things which never happen that causes half the misery from which we suffer.

There is nothing in the world more beautiful or more helpful than a faithful friend, and nothing more difficult to find.

It is a great pity that some people grow bitter as they grow old. It seems as though the more teeth they lose the more they want to bite.

There is nothing as strong as habit. It is told of a physician, who always demanded payment on the spot, that he was so particular that when he prescribed for himself he used to take a guinea out of one pocket and put it into another.

There can be no possible harm in a good natured laugh. Indeed, it is just as truly a duty to look for the pleasant side of life, and while looking to laugh at the rollicking humor which it sometimes displays, as it is to see its more serious and sombre side. The man who honestly believes that he is always walking through a vale of tears either has the dyspepsia or else has got hold of the wrong end of religious conviction. The poet says:—

This life is not all sunshine,
Nor is it yet all showers;
But storms and calms alternate,
As thorns among the flowers.
And while we seek the roses,
The thorns full oft we scan;
Still let us, though they wound us,
Be happy as we can.

LORD LORNE'S brother, Lord Walter Campbell, who studied business in this city with the agents of Messrs. Rathbone of Liverpool, a few years ago, and subsequently entered a firm of bankers in London, is reported to have failed some months ago.

Life in the Tyrol.

CHAMOIS AND BLACK COCK HUNTING—MARRIAGES AMONG PEASANTS.

Corinthia (Austria) Cor. Chicago Times.)

In the secluded valleys of the Austrian Tyrol, as this region is sometimes called, the sports and recreations of the people are in strict accordance with the spirit of by-gone days which characterizes the stanch old race dwelling in the recesses of these almost inaccessible mountains. Living in a country lying between two of the lowest passes of the Alps, which formed the chief highways between civilized Italy and rough Germany, and constantly crossed by victorious or defeated armies marching to or returning from Italy, they have preserved a sturdy, warlike spirit, fostered by their tradititional and steadfast attachment to the ruling house of Hapsburg. The gentry and superior class of peasantry and mountaineers are very fond of target-shooting, which almost invariably follows their weddings, dances and merry-makings, which usually continue throughout the day and night. The targets are placed at a distance of about two hundred yards, and consist of a fixed bull's-eye and rings, a figure of a deer at rest and a "running stag." This consists of the wooden figure of a stag, rigged up by means of a huge pendulum in such a manner that when loosened it darts across an open space eight feet in width, between tall and dense bushes. The pace at which this imitation stag traveled was about equal to a living specimen in full flight, and the target set, over the region of the heart, must be hit while it passes this space, a momentous feat, considering the speed with which the object passes; but I have seen it done several times in succession by these expert riflemen.

A LOVE OF THE CHASE

seems inherent to this hardy people. I have already given a description of stag and chamois hunting, and limited sport is furnished to the intrepid hunter by several varieties of game birds. Among these are the black cock and the golden eagle. The black cock (tetrao tetrix) belongs to the grouse species, and the sport requires great hardihood and patience, and an accurate knowledge of his peculiarities. Like the pinnated grouse of the prairies, he is polygamous; but, unlike them, is shot during the pairing season, the hens being carefully spared. The descriptions the hunters give of the love-sick bird strutting and gambolling around the base of a tree for the edification of the hens who crowd around their lord and master are ludicrous in the extreme. His lone song, which consists of three distinct notes repeated constantly at more or less regular intervals, is frequently his ruin, for in the midst of his ecstacies, during the execution of the third note, he is insensible to danger, and becomes an easy prey to the rifle of the expert huntsman. Of course, if you adopt the English idea of sport you can build a miniature hut or blind of bushes in the course of the day, close to the tree selected by the jealous old cock for his morning song, patiently await the advent of the game, and then murder him in cold blood. But this is far different from the genuine sport, where foot and hand, eye and ear, are on the alert to take advantage of any indiscretion of your quick-witted opponent. It is a contest between the acute intellect of the featherless biped and the keen instinct of his feathered prototype. The golden eagle (aquila chrysaetos), the tiger of his race, is occasionally seen circling around his eyrie among the lofty crags, and his young are sometimes captured by the intrepied hunter. They are of immense size, sometimes measuring eight feet from tip to tip of the wings, and are the greatest foes of the chamois and roe buck, as well as the farmer's stock of young pigs, kids and lambs. I had the pleasurable excitement of seeing one of these rapacious birds carrying off a young chamois, which he had swooped down upon with resistless fury, and by the mere force of the concussion hurled down the abyss, at the brink of which it happened to be feeding. Several times the great weight of the prey obliged him to loosen his hold upon it while circling at a terrible height over ravine and peak. As it fell the eagle darted after it, and catching it in his claws, and sinking thirty or forty feet by the mere impetuosity of his downward flight, he spread his mighty wings to their widest extent and resumed his circling ascent, with his prey firmly clutched in his strong talons.

THE WEDDINGS OF THE PEASANTRY

are solemnized in the chapel, after the usual form of the Catholic Church, but there are some observances connected with them which have a character of their own. One of these consists of presentation of money to the newly-married couple by each person, be it man, woman, or child, present at the wedding. The gifts are received by the godmother of the bride, the mother never being permitted to be present at any part of her daughter's wedding. The name of the donor and the amount of the gift is carefully noted down by a brother or other relation of the bride, and when the giver marries he expects the exact amount of his gift to be returned by the bridegroom. The gift is never less than two florins, about one dollar, one of which is to pay for the supper. Sometimes articles of household furniture are presented, and in some remote valleys the custom still exists of each of the discarded lovers of the bride presenting her with a cradle. Thus, a rustic belle who has for a series of years held her court in her summer palace, the Alp hut, will sometimes find a half dozen of rough cradles at the front door on the morning after the wedding. But the most comical feature of all occurs when guest after guest stands forth and in rough, improvised rhyme and song, accuse the bride or bridegroom of any questionable incidents in their lives, and tells tales of former sins, accompanied by much laughter and shouting. They are usually assembled at the house of the "wirth," or landlord of the village, and dance the day and night away, fortified by copious potations of beer and numerous huge dishes of "speck," bacon; "knodels," balls of dough fried in lard, and "schmarn," flour, water, butter and salt. The dance is the universal valse, varied by an occasional independent "hoe-down," by some of the strapping fellows, who perform some strange gymnastics. I have seen one suddenly spring up from the floor and drop with a thud upon his knees, and then with folded arms throw his head back and strike the hard boards with three or four sounding raps, and then regain his feet with a sudden spring, without touching the floor with his hands—a feat that many an athlete of repute could not imitate. All this time their buxom partners are circling round the room alone, coquettishly spreading out their short but ample skirts, and encouraging their partners to still greater exertions. The music is generally a trombone, sax horn and flute, frequently accompanied by the "zither," which to many cultivated ears is the most charming musical instrument in existence.

In some districts of the Alps

A PECULIAR LAW

of inheritance prevails, by which the eldest son of the peasant succeeds to the ownership of the few acres of land possessed by the father, encumbered by a mortgage to each of his brothers. If he can not, by dint of the greatest economy and care, pay off mortgage after mortgage, his property is sold and his children become paupers. The girls are provided for by little savings of the parents and themselves. The opportunities for acquiring wealth are few indeed, still we find an occasional peasant owning a pretty piece of land with a comfortable house and well built and roomy barns built of stone: and, perhaps even the little church in their immediate vicinity. Formerly a municipal regulation in many rural districts compelled a man desirous of entering into the holy bonds of matrimony to prove a certain income, and also be the owner of a house or a homestead of some kind, before the license was granted. Very recently only has the Austrian Government annulled this law, presumably from the fact that this restriction causes a low state of morality among the solitary young people of the distant peaks and glens of this picturesque country.

Altogether, the inhabitants of these secluded regions afford interesting means of philosophic study, far superior to those afforded the tourist by the porter, speaking imperfect English, at the average hotel recommended by the guide book.

[illegible] Prince, Past and Present.

([illegible])

The Prince of Monaco was the relentless [illegible]. His fathers, indeed, had chastised the people with whips, but Prince Honore chastised them with scorpions. Among other ingenious devices, [illegible], the Prince discovered a new mode of exaction called the monopoly of cereals. He made himself the sole miller and confectioner of his dominions. Every one must eat the Prince's bread, and pay the Prince's price for it. Any person, Monegasque or foreigner, who bought or eat of any unauthorized flour was punished by fine and imprisonment. To make matters worse, the Prince's corn was not only dear, but also bad, the cheapest and vilest sweepings of the Genoese, and Marseillais markets. Travelers passing through the country must leave their sandwiches at the Prince's Custom-house; and workmen coming to their daily work from beyond the borders could not carry their humble luncheon in their pockets, to the prejudice of our lord the Prince, his crown and dignity. The skipper of some little fishing bark who brought a few remaining loaves from Nice or Bordighera into the harbor unconsumed was liable to have his vessel confiscated and be fined a round sum of money into the bargain. Every baker had to keep a register of the amount of bread purchased by each family; and if the consumption seemed under the average, the Prince's gendarmes made a quiet domiciliary visit in search of a hidden barrel suspected to contain contraband flour. The poor wretch found guilty of eating untaxed bread went to prison and his children to the dogs. Similarly, Honore V. had a monopoly of education. He established a college at Mentone, and promulgated a law that no one but his own Professors could keep a school or give private lessons within the Principality. Moreover, he instituted a complicated cattle tax, in accordance with which every peasant had to register at once the birth and sex of every calf or lamb, on the day of its arrival, and upon stamped paper, out of which, of course, the Prince turned another honest penny. If the creature died, the fact must be notified to the Police, or else the family were held to have sold it outside the boundary line, without the knowledge and to the great damage of our sovereign lord. By these and many like petty exactions, Honore V. managed to pocket in 25 years (says M. Adolph Joanne) no less a plum than 6,000,000f.—a very reasonable remuneration for the arduous task of governing 6,000 souls. Had the office been submitted to public competition by open tender, no doubt many a respectable provincial Mayor would gladly have undertaken all the duties for a round sum of 200f. a year. Prince Florestan, his successor, was compelled to abolish the corn monopoly, but still stuck to the other princely abuses. Accordingly, in 1848, as I have already mentioned, the better half of his dominions, including Mentone and Roccabruna, declared themselves independent, and so remained till the French annexation of Nice. At that period his Highness of Monaco, always ready to look at every political change in a commercial spirit, sold to the Emperor his shadowy feudal rights over his revolted lieges for another lump sum of £160,000. Moreover, he obtained leave to open his gaming tables at the Cassino, and so prepared the way for his present magnificent fortune. A private person who should make a living by keeping roulette-tables would not be looked upon with favor in general society, but as Prince Florestan is a crowned head, and the descendant of so many respectable hereditary plunderers, with a pedigree reaching back to a land pirate of the tenth century, we must not be guilty of scandalum magnatum by calling him ugly names. So we will leave the poor blind old man unmolested in his great white roomy palace, haunted only by the ghosts of the ruined men who blow their brains out at Monte Carlo, after losing their last napoleon, at the appalling rate of some dozen per annum. Monaco is a beautiful little domain, but still I would not like to stand in the Prince's shoes.

Russian Sample-Rooms.

(London Globe.)

The enemies of licensed victualers in England should, if they desire a few hours' sincere gratification, take a trip to St. Petersburg, where the kabacs, or small taverns, are dealt with in a high-handed way quite peculiar to the dominions of the czar. These places of entertainment had, as the Molva explains, immensely increased in Russia until about six years ago, when the authorities suddenly resolved to take them in hand. Between that time and this they have accordingly diminished the number from 1,100 to 181, a result which speaks volumes as to the sanctity of vested interests in the Russian official mind. But with the reduction in number of those houses came a result which was not quite so gratifying in a pecuniary as in an ethical point of view. The army of drunkards which offended the eyes of moralists in the capital of Holy Russia, did certainly dwindle in a most undeniable style. But then the excise receipts in the treasury fell off also in like proportion, and during the last three years at least the minister of finance has not been exactly in a position to acquiesce very cheerfully in such a loss of revenue. Consequently, as the kabacs vanished, the small hotels multiplied in a corresponding ratio, and the lovers of strong drinks were also encouraged by finding a quantity of new retail stores where they might buy their favorite potations, and carry them off to be discussed at home. The kabac, thus persecuted and driven out of the field, threatens to become before long a rather rare relic of the past, and it may in future time be interesting to remember what were its distinguished peculiarities. The principal articles sold at the counter there are bottles of beer, which cost from 4d to 5d each, "measures" of eau-de-vie, containing as much as three liqueur glasses, and costing 3½d; and in the way of eatables nothing more epicurean than bread and salt. This frugality is not the result of any unwillingness on the part of the tavern-keepers to encourage the idleness of eating, but is imposed upon them by an order of the government. Another rule which is exactly opposed to the policy of our English law is that no kabac may provide its guests with seats. This restriction is, however, evaded by the simple process of sitting on the floor, while the prohibition as to selling food is frustrated by the presence of costermongers and basket-carriers, who hang about the doors and provide the drinkers with various delicacies, in the shape of herrings, onions, butter, eggs, and potatoes.

Wheat-Growing.

Mr. Mechi, the celebrated English Agriculturist, who died last December, writing to the Mark Lane Express, said, those who have witnessed his wheat crops during the last thirty years must be convinced that on poorest soils, such as his, great wheat crops can be profitably grown, under the needful conditions, one of them being selected seed; and this he obtained in all his cereal crops by a powerful blower, which, being used after the ordinary dressing machine, leaves only the heaviest and most powerful kernels. After doing this, one is surprised at the large number of imperfect corns that have been blown out. He has grown his largest crop of wheat, over seven quarters per acre, on several occasions on those portions of the field sown, or rather dibbled, with one peck per acre, on kernel in each dibble hole. Wheat crops require a very highly fertilized soil, for, owing to its root formation, Liebig tells us, that in order to produce one full wheat crop, there must be within reach of the roots, the manure elements of 100 wheat crops.

Again he says, quoting Liebeg, although the land is not sufficiently rich, or manured to produce a full wheat crop, many rye crops can be grown, and when these fail, oats, which possess a greater number of roots and more exhaustive power can still succeed after the rye fails. If, then, we are to grow large crops of wheat it must be by enriching our poor lands, by means of a more abundant supply of manure. Land can never be too rich for wheat, provided we do not overseed.

A pamphlet written in Arabic is making a great stir in Constantinople. The work—which bears the character of a clandestine publication, since it is not to be found at any of the booksellers'—has been written by two sheiks, from Mecca, who came to Constantinople on purpose to complete and publish it. It is destined for distribution in all Mussulman countries. Among other things, it demonstrates the sovereignty and legitimate authority of the Caliph of the Mohammedans, to whatever climate they may belong, and to whatever Government they may be subject. It may, therefore, be considered an essentially political work, intended to strengthen and extend the power of the Sultan. It is asserted that several millions of copies have already been sent to Algeria, Tunis, and Morocco, and that a large number are to be introduced into India and the eastern provinces of Russia.

NOTICE.

THE Canada Advertising Agency, No. 29 King Street West, Toronto, W. W. BUTCHER, Manager, Is authorized to receive advertisements for this paper.

The Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway Company are, we hear, determined to push on the contemplated improvements in connection with their road. They have given out contracts for the timber for a grain elevator at Owen Sound, ties, &c. They do not, we believe, intend seeking any further aid from the townships. We are also informed that it is the intention of the management in their own hands, as their inability to secure the full amount of bonuses asked for, will prevent the carrying out of the arrangement made with the Grand Trunk.

As will be seen, by reference to our report of the proceedings of the County Council, the advocates of a House of Refuge for the poor, have again brought the matter to the notice of the Council. We regret to say it has met its usual fate—referred to a committee to report on at the June session, which means that nothing will be done. We hope the gentlemen who have taken the matter in hand will not let it rest till they succeed, as we consider the present method of assisting the poor, infirm and homeless is very unsatisfactory.

The long lost and often found Charlie Ross has again turned up; this time at a place called Aldborough, near London, living with a German named Joseph Bonn. Mr. Ross has been written to, but is rather doubtful about the boy being his son, and declines going to see him, unless better evidence is aduced than is at present forthcoming. Mr. Ross has expened $60,000 in the search for his lost child, and says he has not the heart to go when the probality is that he will meet only with disappointment. He urges those who have discovered the boy and think he is the veritable Charlie, to try and find out all they can from the boy himself, as he feels assured, if it really is his child, he will be able to remember something in connection with his early life, that would prove his identity beyond cavil.

Mr. Charles Grant, of Thornbury, who has taken more prizes for spring grain in the last two years, at our Provincial and Dominion Fairs than any other man in Ontario, paid our sanctum a visit last week So highly did our Government think of his grain that they purchased 10 bags from him to be sent for exhibition at the Corn Exchange in Egland, to show the people of Europe what "this Canada of ours" is capable of producing. Mr. Grant left with us specimens, shelled and in the ear, of his celebrated French Spring Wheat, for which he received a special Diploma at the Provincial Exhibition held at Hamilton last fall. It is the largest spring grain we ever saw, of a bright color, and full in the berry. Mr. G. is the only person in Canada who has this particular kind of wheat, and parties dsirous of purchasing some of it, will have to apply to Mr. Grant himself. The specimens are on exhibition at this office.

NOTICE.—We wish it disinctly understood, that we do not hold ourselves reponsible for the opinions expressed by our correspondents.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

SIR,—My attention has been called to an article in this week's issue of your paper re "Information wanted." Though not infallible, I am thankful to be able to say, as far as I am concerned, "Not Guilty." Your proper course in a case of this kind is through the Post Office Inspector.

Yours Truly,
RICHARD PRIDHAM,
Railway Mail Clerk, T., G. & B. R'y.
February 5th, 1881.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

DEAR SIR,—The first Masquerade Carnival in this Village was given on the rink, newly erected, by Mr. John Hanbury, and notwithstanding the unpropitious weather, was very fairly attended by masquers and others, and the costumes of the former were very good, especialy the ladies, who dressed with extreme good taste. The flower girls of Mrs. Atkinson and Miss Hattie Jeninngs deservedly earning the praises bestowed upon them for their graceful skating. These were the only two who competed for prizes. The rest of the ladies amused themselves in circling the rink; the three representing snowflakes looking remarkably well, and the character of "old woman," by Miss Hattie Phillips, deserves a special mention. Of course the gentlemen do not care for much mention; but the worst skater does really deserve great praise in the way he tried to break his head or some other part of his anatomy. The Dutchman contributed not a little to the success of the evening, as did also the men of color. The fat man and old man were very good, and the obesity of the former contrasted greatly with the slimness of the latter, but such is life,—The twin brothers looked well in costume; but how a twin brother can look him in the face and tell him he is two or three years older, is one of those things that "no fellow can understand;" but there were the twins.

The bandits, Messrs Steinhoff and Kershaw, looked very well, and the the clown, by Mr, A. V. Galbraith, was well represented, and his skating was very graceful. The band, however, must not be forgotten, as they enlivened the evening very materially by discoursing sweet music to a very appreciative audience. The following is a list of the successfull competitiors: Fastest Skater (one mile) A. V. Galbraith; 2nd W. B. Bloomer; Fat man, Chas. Knapp; Old Man, John Marshall; Twin Brothers, W.J Shaw and J. C. Atkinson; Best Gent's Costume, George Lamon; Swell Negro, W. A. Mackay; India Chief; George Lamon; Worst Skater, W. J. Shaw; Best Lady's Costume, Mrs. Atkinson: Best Skater- Gent. A. V. Galbraith; Best Lady Skater, Miss Hattie Jenings; Tom Thumb, Harry Lamon; Flower Girl, Miss Hattie Jennings: Best dressed Lady, Mrs. Atkinson; Clown, A. V. Galbraith; Dutchman, W. Sutton. The Judges were D. McWilliams of this Village, Mr. Henry Whytby of Markdale, and Mr. Phillips of London, who gave every satisfaction in their decisions. The ice, notwithstanding the heavy thaw, was in excellent condition, which speaks well for the care taken of the rink, and it is to be hoped that many more carnivals will be held in it, as everything went off in the most satisfactory manner, and a great vote of thanks is due Mr. John Hanbury for providing a pleasant recreation these winter nights. The Shelburne people were well represented, especially Mr. Mullin, whose costume, to say the least, was excellent. Yours truly,

A LOOKER-ON.

P.S.—I had forgotten the representation of "Old Bags," who meandered round the rink in the true style, studying, from a skating point of view the intricacies of the art, and what to do with a cigar that would not light.

Is a compound of the virtues of sarsaparilla, stillingia, mandrake, yellow dock, with the iodide of potash and iron, all powerful blood-making, blood-cleansing, and life-sustaining elements. It is the purest, safest, and most effectual alterative medicine known or available to the public. The sciences of medicine and chemistry have never produced so valuable a remedy, nor one so potent to cure all diseases resulting from impure blood. It cures Scrofula and all scrofulous diseases, Erysipelas, Rose, or St. Anthony's Fire, Pimples and Face-grubs, Pustules, Blotches, Boils, Tumors, Tetter, Humors, Salt Rheum, Scald-head, Ring-worm, Ulcers, Sores, Rheumatism, Mercurial Disease, Neuralgia, Female Weaknesses and Irregularities, Jaundice, Affections of the Liver, Dyspepsia, Emaciation, and General Debility.

By its searching and cleansing qualities it purges out the foul corruptions which contaminate the blood and cause derangement and decay. It stimulates and enlivens the vital functions, promotes energy and strength, restores and preserves health, and infuses new life and vigor throughout the whole system. No sufferer from any disease which arises from impurity of the blood need despair who will give AYER'S SARSAPARILLA a fair trial.

It is folly to experiment with the numerous low-priced mixtures, of cheap materials, and without medicinal virtues, offered as blood-purifiers, while disease becomes more firmly seated. AYER'S SARSAPARILLA is a medicine of such concentrated curative power, that it is by far the best, cheapest, and most reliable blood-purifier known. Physicians know its composition, and prescribe it. It has been widely used for forty years, and has won the unqualified confidence of millions whom it has benefited.

The world should be aroused to the deplorable condition of the females of our land! The enfeebled frame, the pale, bloodless cheeks, hollow eyes, nervous debility, and the various distressing forms of female weakness, are matters that every matron in our country should consider. Mr. R. C. Balmer. Dear Sir,—It affords me unqualified pleasure to bear testimony to the benefit I have experienced from using Burdock Blood Bitters. For several years I have suffered from oft-recurring, bilious Headaches, Dyspepsia, and complaints peculiar to my sex, which now I am entirely relieved from, if not cured by using only about half a bottle of the Bitters. I beg to return you my sincere thanks for recommending to me such a valuable medicine.

I remain, yours sincerely,

A Miser's Death.—Robert Taylor, an old inhabitant of London township, was found dead in his bed at home on the 8th con., a few nights ago. He was aged 82 years and a bachelor recluse. His only companions through life were dogs and cats. No woman was ever allowed to enter his door. He had amassed a fortune by stock-raising. He always kept his money hidden in different parts of the house, and once a party of robbers entered and gagged him, and then took from him a large sum of money. He was ever after suspicious of strangers, and denied them admission. He leaves a large amount in the banks of this city and one of the finest farms in London township.

ACCIDENT ON THE NORTHERN RAILWAY.

ONE MAN KILLED.

Newmarket, Jan. 31.—This morning the mail train ran off the track on the curve just north of Lundy's mill. The engine and tender kept the rails: the front end of the baggage car was off the track as well as the rear end of the smoking car, but they did not leave the road-bed. The two rear coaches, containing passengers, were wrenched from the trucks and thrown over an embankment—one of the coaches being impaled on a cedar post. A passenger named Tullford was found lying under the platform, between the two passenger coaches, dead. There is at present nothing to show how he came to his death, no outward injuries having been discovered on him. He had over $1,000 on his person. Two or three others passengers received slight bruises, while others, amongst them Conductor Hendrick, were considerably shaken when the train was being dragged over a culvert after leaving the rails. It is supposed to have been caused by the frost and the rails spreading. It is said this is the first fatal accident which has occurred on the Northern for twenty years, as far as the railway is concerned.

Knitting.

At her window she is sitting,
Little busy bright coquette,
She is sitting, knitting, knitting,
Ever at a subtle net.

Weaving in it laughter, blushes,
And delicious nods and smiles,
Tones as soft as notes of thrushes,
And a thousand nameless wiles.

Take care, my bewitching neighbour,
Take care that you do not get,
At the end of all your labour,
Tangled in your subtle net.

Selfishness.

When icicles hang from the tree,
And winter winds drearily moan,
When rivers and rivulets freeze,
There's green in some far away zone.

But what is the knowledge of this,
The joy of a far away zone?
Oh, small seems another soul's bliss,
When deep sorrow reigns in our own!

CHAPTER I.

"Poor children, it will be a sad change for them—a terrible break-up! For I fear this is but a dull house for such young things, and how can I make it otherwise?"

Colonel McLeod rested his head on his hand and sighed.

There was apparently no reason for depression, for all Colonel McLeod's surroundings betokened ease and wealth. The room in which he sat was large and handsomely furnished. The walls were covered from floor to ceiling with oaken book-shelves. On one side of the room stood a grand piano; rich Turkey carpets covered the floor; a tiger-skin was before the fire-place, whereon was stretched a magnificent collie dog of purest breed; and in the reading-chair, near which was a stand of beautiful tropical flowers, sat the owner of this great lonely house and the broad lands that surround it, who would have given up every one of his possessions to stand blameless before the world.

Colonel Loris McLeod was a remarkably handsome man; he looked scarcely more than six or seven and thirty, but a reference to the Army List would have shown him to be some years older. The tall slight form, with the upright military carriage, tempered with easy grace, had still all the suppleness of youth; the dark gray eyes, large and well set under the broad forehead, had lost none of their fire; and, although a changeless melancholy clouded his countenance, not one jot of the ardour and military enthusiasm of his earlier days was abated. Whatever he might suffer he remained always a soldier.

The letter which had prompted the Colonel's half regretful words had fallen to the floor, and he remained for several moments in deep and apparently sad thought. The lines of the firm but singularly sweet mouth had settled even to sternness, and the frown had deepened on his forehead, over which he kept passing his hand. Presently he stooped, and picked up the letter again.

"Poor Verner!" he muttered, and his lip quivered a little. "So he is gone. They all go so, before the one who would lay down life without a pang. How strange it seems! He who could be so ill spared is taken! And I? Of what use is this life to me? And yet perhaps I am wrong to say that; moralists tell us that no man or woman who lives is absolutely useless. And I suppose old Colin here wouldn't like another master"—and there was a tinge of bitterness in his tone. "Well, Albert Verner was one of the few who believed in me entirely, and he is gone"—he paused, and a half smile flitted over the grave features—"and leaves his poor lassies to me! Well, he might have chosen a better guardian for them!"

He again read the letter in his hand.

"They tell me I am dying," it ran; "and I am leaving my two poor children alone in a world cruel enough to well-nigh penniless orphans. I know not where to turn. I am in despair. In my strait the only one I have a faint idea who would help me is yourself. You and I were brother officers long ago. We fought side by side in the Mutiny, and I think we loved each other well. Will you try to remember the old days, Loris, and be guardian to my two darlings? They have each a little sum coming to them—just enough to keep them; but they have no friends or relatives. And the elder girl is but seventeen; and a dear wild Irish girl at that—a child——"

The letter here suddenly broke off, as though the hand of the writer had failed him. Colonel McLeod laid down the letter and took up an enclosure, penned in a business hand.

"Sir," it said, "on looking over the papers left by my late client Albert Verner, Esq., late of the—th Lancers, residing at Rocklands, Ballyshowan, Connaught, I found the enclosed letter addressed to you. I was requested by Miss Verner to examine all papers left by her father; and, finding that in this letter Mr. Verner requests you to undertake the guardianship of his children, I think it my duty on their behalf to state that these young ladies are left wholly unprotected, nor are they fitted by age, experience, or education to obtain their own living. They will each of them possess the sum of five hundred pounds, which, however well invested, would not produce sufficient for their entire maintenance. I trust you will pardon me for having brought these facts under your notice; but my late client was much esteemed by myself and my partner, and I thought it my duty to do what I could for his children.

"I am, sir, your obedient servant,

"PATRICK SULLIVAN."

The name of the firm of solicitors—one known to the Colonel—was stamped on the paper.

"Poor lassies—poor little lassies!" said Loris McLeod to himself.

Then he rose and began to pace up and down, pulling his moustache thoughtfully.

"I suppose they are living on nothing now. Poor Verner! He must have got through a lot of money; but Irishmen never have any head for business. I dare say what the children have won't keep a girl in gloves—if they wear gloves down there, by the way. But, of course, there's only one thing to be done. Dear old Albert! I cannot repay his faith in me by leaving his bairns to misery. It's very difficult to know how to act, though. Can I have them here. I wonder? That was my first thought. School?"

He shook his head. He had a horror of boarding-schools. And for home-brought-up girls too it would be cruel. For all things weaker than himself Colonel McLeod had a tenderness that almost amounted to weakness.

"At any rate they must be got into harness a little at first. What is the age of the elder girl? Seventeen. And a child at that; and I am forty, and——"

He caught his breath quickly, as though some sharp pain had seized him.

"Well, no one thinks of my marrying. I am sober enough to take care of two children, I fancy. I'll have an elderly lady to play propriety. It will break into my life awfully, though."

He half sighed, and ran his long slender fingers through his hair. He had grown used to a solitary life, and had become perhaps morbidly attached to it. He shrank from the idea of having the house invaded by a couple of wild girls, who would burst into the library when he was reading, never be punctual—and Loris McLeod had a soldier's dislike to unpunctuality—who would intrude into his most sacred haunts, and who in short must necessarily break up a retirement that he had clung to from mere habit; for naturally the Colonel loved change and society. Then again he objected to the constant society of any man or woman. He thought that no one could possibly have any affection for him, and that he could not make the girls happy.

Yet, if Loris McLeod had gauged himself truly, there were few men more fitted to win love than he. Children and women adored him, and men were drawn to him, although reluctantly, even while the black cloud that hung over his name half repelled them.

"And yet," he murmured—and he looked round the room wistfully—"young faces, young bright voices—I think I could bear them, even here. Ah, Heaven, they might have been mine even now! But these children will not be happy here," he said gloomily; and he stood looking down at the collie, whose honest brown eyes gazed back at him affectionately. "You and I, Colin, are made for each other. You don't mind what your master's mood is, so long as you have a caress—eh, old fellow?"

He bent down and patted the animal fondly on the head, and Colin rose and pushed his nose into his master's hand in response.

"After all there is no one half so faithful as a dog," said Loris McLeod, with a smile. "But then how little they know!"

Colonel McLeod was always prompt in whatever he did; it never took him long to arrive at a decision, and that done he would act upon it. He had indeed some misgivings as to what his housekeeper would say; also some as to what his fellow-officers might think; but neither caused him much uneasiness; he lived so much out of society that it mattered very little to him what society said or thought. He was not young, and the girls would be in the school-room; besides an elderly chaperon would make all things right.

"It's unfortunate," thought the Colonel, as he rang the bell for Mrs. Grant the housekeeper, "their coming just now. I should like to run over and bring the lassies myself; but it's impossible. These manœuvres are coming off and I can't get away."

Mrs. Grant received the news he imparted to her with much greater favour than he had expected. She listened to what he said, and, when he had finished, her honest face beamed with the admiration she felt for his kindness.

"If ye are not a real McLeod, sir," she said, with the familiarity of an old servant, "I don't know what a gentleman is. To think of ye putting up with a pair o' wild Irish bairns! Ah, Colonel, ye'll have the blessing, so ye will! Aweel, sir, and how soon will the young leddies be coming, and where will I put them?"

"Oh, I leave that to you, Mrs. Grant!" answered McLeod, smiling. "Only of course the best and brightest room, and I should think they would like to be together; probably they have always occupied the same room; but I can leave all arrangements to you, I know. Will you send Hector to me in twenty minutes, please?"

When Mrs. Grant had departed, charged to tell the wonderful news downstairs, which she did with many encomiums on the Colonel's generosity, Loris McLeod sat down and wrote a letter to Mr. Sullivan.

"It is my wish and intention," he said, "to receive the Misses Verner into my charge, and I pledge myself to act as their guardian and to undertake all responsibilities consequent on that assumption until they shall become of age. After that they must choose for themselves. I regret that it is absolutely impossible for me to leave my duties at this moment, or I should have had great pleasure in making myself known to you and my future charges. If you will kindly let me know however when it will be convenient for the young ladies to cross, I will send over a suitable escort, who will thus relieve you of all trouble. I beg to enclose a cheque for immediate necessities; my servant will see to everything else when she comes. I cannot conclude without thanking you for the interest you have taken in my old friend's daughters. I should have been pained had you been less frank about their affairs."

* * * * *

"I like his letter," was Mr. Sullivan's comment to his wife over the breakfast-table—"a trifle reserved, but good. Let me see; wasn't there something about Colonel McLeod rather—h'm—ugly during the Mutiny?"

"I don't remember, my dear. I dare say; but it won't hurt the girls. Dear me, what a change for them, after this life, to a military household!"

When told of their future, Alice, the younger girl, burst into tears and bemoaned her sad fate, saying that she was positive she should hate Colonel McLeod, for he was sure to be a stiff martinet. But Cecil Verner stood gravely by her sister, with her arm round her, her large blue eyes dreamy with thought, and strove to comfort Alice.

"Don't cry, Alice," she said, "I dare say we shall be much happier than we think now. Perhaps Colonel McLeod isn't very strict; papa wasn't, you know. Loris McLeod! I like his name—I wonder what he is like."

CHAPTER II.

It was with no little anxiety that Colonel McLeod awaited the arrival of the two new inmates of Ridinghurst; he had sent off Janet Grant, a niece of the housekeeper, with instructions to spare no expense with regard to anything required by the sisters; Janet was to use her own discretion as to what those requirements were. He knew he could trust Janet, for she had lived for a long time as travelling maid in a nobleman's family, and, having just returned home, he had engaged her to wait on his wards.

Unfortunately the day that they would arrive from Ireland was the last day of the manœuvres, which were to conclude with an inspection by the Commander-in-Chief; and the Colonel expected to be kept late. It would seem inhospitable indeed for these homeless girls to find nobody to receive them when them when they arrived. However, there was no help for it; so Colonel McLeod rode away early in the morning, having given a last injunction to Mrs. Grant to be sure to apologise to the Misses Verner for his apparent neglect.

"Heaven bless the Colonel!" said the good dame while standing on the hall steps to see him ride off. "He's just every bit as tender-hearted as a girl, and as particular about politeness to these wild Irish lasses as if they was the Queen on her throne. Bless my soul, Grant"—turning to her husband the butler—"he looks that handsome in his uniform, you'd take him for thirty, that you would!"

* * * * *

As the Colonel had expected, the autumn day had already closed in before he rode up the avenue of magnificent trees which led to the house; his eyes scanned the windows, for he half expected to see lights in the drawing-room, and his heart beat a little faster as he urged on his horse. A few moments later he sprang to the ground, and consigned his charger to Hector's care.

Mrs. Grant met him in the hall. Subdued excitement was visible in her face.

"They've come, sir; they've come," she said, taking the Colonel's helmet from his hand as he passed with a half smile at her eagerness. "And oh, sir, Miss Verner is such a bonny young leddie! Janet says she's the sweetest lassie she ever waited on. You won't wait, Colonel, now to take off that dress, will you?"—persuasively; for the good woman was anxious that the young "leddies" should see her master in his uniform.

"Why, Mrs. Grant," said McLeod, laughing, and unbuckling his sword, "you are as excited as though the children were your own. I won't wait; how long have they been here?"

"Oh, they came about five, Colonel, and I sent them in some tea! The youngest, Miss Alice, is young looking; but I thought you'd have them dine with you."

"Of course," replied the Colonel; and he turned away towards the drawing-room door, his spurred heels ringing on the tesselated pavement.

As Colonel McLeod entered the room, a tall lithe girlish figure rose from the depths of an arm-chair drawn near the fire—for the evenings were chilly—a pair of large wistful blue eyes were turned anxiously towards the door, and two delicate hands were clasped close together. So much Loris McLeod took in at the first glance, as he went across the great room; and, as his eyes rested upon that winning gracious beauty, it seemed to appeal to him with a strange force; old memories came rushing back at the sight of Albert Verner's child standing thus in that house; he forgot the words of welcome he had framed, forgot all but that a fair girlish face looked up to him with an earnest half-questioning gaze.

"My child!" was all he said, as he took both her hands in his in a close warm clasp. It was all he could say for a few moments.

The tears rushed to the poor Irish girl's eyes; she was impulsive and warm-hearted, and this welcome touched her to the quick. She had felt lonely and strange in this new unfamiliar house; but one look at Colonel McLeod's noble face had sent a thrill through her whole frame, and she felt as though she had known him for years.

"So you are Albert Verner's daughter," said the Colonel, looking down smilingly at the lovely face; and almost involuntarily he bent down and kissed her forehead with a tender reverence.

A bright flush rose to the girl's brow. She never quite forgot the joy that the gentle pressure of his lips had given to her young heart.

"But there is another, is there not?" asked McLeod, looking round. "You are not alone?"

"No. Alice—oh, Alice!"

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

In some of the islands of the South Pacific where the clam attains a great size, diving for clams is one of the occupations of the natives. The diver thrusts a sharp iron rod into the mouth of the clam, which closes its shell with such tenacity that it can be pulled out of its bed. Occasionally divers who have carelessly allowed themselves to be caught in the grip of too powerful a clam have only saved their lives by cutting off their fingers, and leaving them at the bottom of the sea.

Girls' Allowances.

THE ADVANTAGES OF TEACHING THEM TO KEEP ACCOUNTS—THE COST OF EXPERIENCE—A FINANCIAL PROBLEM WHICH PUZZLES MANY MATRONS—RICH AND POOR.

(London Queen.)

One hears pretty constantly of the necessity of keeping accounts, and that, to be a good housekeeper, a woman should possess at least a rudimentary knowledge of the value of money. But, curiously enough, no one ever suggests from whence women are to get their knowledge, rudimentary or otherwise. In former days—and the tradition still lingers—it was believed that complete knowledge of cookery and housekeeping would come by nature as soon as the ring was fitted on the bride's finger, let her maiden life have been as free from any domestic care as it is possible to imagine; and many a miserable hour that delusion cost the new-made wife. But still we firmly believe that our daughters, brought up in girlhood as ignorant as anything concerning money as any lilies of the field, will develope, at any rate, a sufficient knowledge of its value and management the day they undertake the charge of a household. Some may do so, but very certainly most do not, and, in consequence, go through an immense amount of worry and trouble before they acquire experience. Now, experience must be bought. It can neither be borrowed nor given. So, in common fairness, we should try to let our dear ones buy theirs as cheaply as may be, and not, to save ourselves trouble and anxiety, expose them to the danger of purchasing it at the last moment at a price that may cost them much actual suffering, and even in some cases their domestic happiness.

ON AN ALLOWANCE.

As soon as they are able to understand a little what money is, children should have an allowance, however tiny, for their pocket-money. By means of this they will gradually learn the value and use of money. They will learn that if all is spent to-day, there will be none to-morrow—a lesson, by the way, that many of their elders would do well to learn!—and also the true meaning of charity. Giving a child money to give to the poor may be a pleasure to them, and a pretty way of helping those in want; but I doubt that teaching a child the meaning even of the form of charity that consists in giving. Simply giving our money or our time, when we have plenty of both, is hardly real charity, which surely does not mean giving what costs us nothing. But, if the money or the time has cost us some self-denial in the way of personal exertion or economy, then truly the gift blesses both giver and receiver. By the way, this may explain what one hears of so often from people, namely, "the ingratitude of the lower orders." The rich give of their superfluity, and exact in return gratitude. If gratitude were as easy as giving what it costs us nothing to spare, the exchange would be fair enough; but, unluckily, gratitude is at least as difficult a virtue as self-denial. Both virtues come naturally to some people, no doubt, but those people, I fear we must confess, are not the rule, but the exception that proves it.

BUYING EXPERIENCE.

But to return to our children and their pocket money. As soon as they are old enough for responsibility, the allowance should be increased to cover some necessaries, as well as their menus plaisirs. Girls at twelve or fourteen should be given so much a quarter for pocket money and for gloves, ties and the repairs of their boots and shoes. Some people give the allowance for the chaussure itself; but this is hardly a safe plan. Growing children should never wear either tight or short boots and shoes; but girls don't understand what suffering the transgression of this rule will entail in after years, and naturally think that if they choose to economize on their boots at some personal inconvenience it is quite fair. This allowance should always be punctually paid and the recipient be made fully to understand what she is to provide with it, and the tidiness and thorough repair of such articles should be always insisted on. As they get older, girls should always, if possible, have an allowance for their dress and little personal expenses. This is not the cheapest way of clothing them, for the mother's experience always enables her to lay out the money more profitably than the girls are able to do, at any rate at first. But to dress the girls economically and pretty is not a mother's only object. She has to teach them the value of, and responsibility entailed by, money, and lets them buy, at a low rate, and at her cost, the experience they would otherwise purchase far more dearly at their own or rather husband's expense. If properly managed, a girl's allowance will be a capital means of teaching these lessons.

KEEPING ACCOUNTS.

A girl should be given a fair stock of clothes and an account book, in which she should be taught to enter every thing she spends and receives. This book should be balanced every quarter when the next allowance is given, and strict accuracy insisted on. Debt should never be allowed. She should be taught that if a thing can not be afforded, it must be done without till such time as the means of paying for it are in hand. Still, in spite of all precautions, some girls will get into trouble. If they do, don't scold them, so as to make them hide it next time, which would entail worse consequences than even the debt; but point out her fault, pay the debt at once if possible, and hold the girl responsible for it, until by degrees and self-denial she has paid it back to you. Don't take a girl's allowance away because she is troublesome to manage, but watch her, and oblige her to be careful, encouraging her if she really tries her best, but making her feel the inconvenience and trouble caused by extravagance and carelessness. While avoiding frightening a girl from confessing her difficulties by over-severity, don't give way to the opposite extreme, and teach her to think lightly of debt. If she gets to feel that when she exceeds her allowance she has only "to go to papa" or "tell mamma," and coax the required deficit from them, or at worst, submit to a scolding, and so get it, all the good of an allowance is done away. She gets not to mind debt, for will not her father give her a check if she asks for it prettily at the right moment? Or will not mother, after half an hour's lecture, pay it out of her own pocket, while the culprit gets of scatheless.

WHERE THE MONEY GOES.

Strictly kept accounts should be insisted on. Girls can not too early learn method, and this is one very good way of teaching it, beside teaching them the value of money. One often hears people say, "Oh, what is the good of those strict accounts? I had so much in my purse yesterday and now there is only so much, and all the accounts in the world won't bring it back." Granted; but, if properly kept, they will show how the money went, and that is sometimes a difficulty when one depends on ones receipts for the large, and one's memory for the small items of one's expenditure. I heard once of a lady who was considerably annoyed by finding herself short of some money. Reckon it how she would she could not account for the loss. The house was searched, servants questioned and a thoroughly uncomfortable feeling produced in the household, as every one felt the money must have gone somewhere. The lady was very particular, and, though not keeping regular accounts, prided herself on her accuracy and memory, and keeping all her receipts and housekeeping books in splendid order. At last her husband insisted on her putting down every small sum she could remember, in spite of her protestations that she had done this herself; and little by little, with a good deal of trouble, she accounted for some of the missing change. Eventually the whole sum was accounted for by one of her children at school writing to thank her for some small present she had sent and totally forgotten. Now, if a person who is particular as to money matters can produce such confusion, imagine the results of carelessness. Until strict account is kept, no girl realizes how sixpences and shillings run up; and, had as the effect of this carelessness will be as a girl, judge what it will be when she is a woman with a household and its innumerable small wants.

A CONTRAST.

Among the poor, girls learn very early the value of money, as wives have usually a very fair idea of making the most of what comes in their way in spite of the accusation of thriftlessness so often brought against them. (When contrasting the comforts of their households with the wages weekly earned by their husbands one must remember that it is only a part of their pay which the women get, and in far too many cases only a very small part.) But girls of the upper and middle classes rarely learn any thing of money by actual experience. Their allowances are not so definitely fixed and kept to as to teach them its value even in dress necessaries. If they get into debt they are allowed to scramble on as best they can, or else they are helped out by main force, as it were. It is far easier to pay the debt when one discovers it, and let the culprit off with a more or less severe scolding, than to exercise the constant care and watchfulness that will keep the girl from mischief, or, at any rate, teach the girl to see the consequences of her folly, and help her, by self-denial, to atone for it. It may seem a hard view to take of what may be called the natural carelessness of youth; but there is an old saying, "As the sapling is bent the tree grows," and if a girl who is careless of debt is not taught right as a girl, what can she be when she grows up? If she is allowed to think that if she can not "cut her coat to her cloth," as the proverb runs, the fault lies with the cloth, not the cutter—can you wonder if, as a woman, she is extravagant and careless in money matters, fully convinced that this carelessness is at worst an amiable weakness, for which she is in nowise to blame, the real culprit being fate, which has denied her a sufficient fortune for her wants, or her husband, who fails to supply her with the necessary liberality.

Double-Handed Copy.

A REPORTER ATTEMPTS TO FURNISH COPY AT DOUBLE HIS USUAL RATE OF SPEED.

(From the Kansas City Journal.)

There is a reporter at the Times office who writes with equal rapidity with either hand. He is an ambidexter, and a bold, bad one at that. When there is a rush of work at the office and the devil is shouting "coppe" like a fiend incarnate, this reporter sits down at his desk in full company front, and, with a pencil in each hand, slings off local happenings by the yard. He writes on two sheets at once, and doesn't let his right hand know what his left hand is driving at, but it's driving all the same.

Yesterday he got a little off his mental base, and attempted to write up a dog fight and a wedding in high life at the same time. He got things mixed. His hands ran clear away with the gray matter in his skull, and things became terribly confused. This is the way his items telescoped each other:

"At Grace Church last night the nuptials of Mr. Thomas Johnson and Miss Julia Lawrence were celebrated in most magnificent style. A costly floral horse shoe being directly over the altar, and when the yellow cur saw the flames of anger darting from the eyes of the brindle fyste he opened with the impressive strains of the wedding march. As the handsome couple walked down the aisle the excited crowd began to get frantic, and there were yells of "Sick 'em, Bull," "At him now, Towser," as the spectators became interested in the fight. The bride was elegantly attired in pure white of the most costly fabrics, and she wore the traditional white veil and wreath of orange blossoms had him by his neck and his tongue began to loll out and his eyes to turn somersaults as if in the customary black dress suit, white gloves, ears cropped close to his head.

"He was a disreputable looking dog in the beginning, and ought to have been whipped for being so homely. He is of good family and is engaged in one of the most extensive manufacturing enterprises in the West. But the yellow cur seemed to be getting the advantage, as he had now succeeded in getting a death grip on the throat of the big brindle, and when he tenderley kissed the bride according to the ancient custom his back was covered with mud and his off hind leg was terribly chewed up.

"Among the costly presents received by the happy pair were a fine grand piano from the father of the bride hair had been scalded from his back and one eye seemed to have been struck with an anger. After a short bridal tour the happy pair will settle down to one of the hardest fought battles the reporter has yet witnessed, and it was difficult to tell which dog had been punished worst. The fight ended at exactly 4:48, after having been bitterly contested for an hour and a half were driven to the residence of the bride's parents, and he was taken to his owner's home in a wheelbarrow. He will probably never recover, and if he does will be totally blind. Besides being permanently lame in the left hind leg, the beautiful bride received the congratulations of a host of friends. The groom is one of our most promising young men, and his owner dreads the possibility of losing him, as he fears he can never replace him. The father of the bride is one of our wealthiest merchants, and the yellow fyste limped off with a knowing look in his eye and a saucy curl in his tail, as much as to say: 'Who else wants to try me?'"

The ambidexter was summarily "fired."

How our Forests are Used Up.

(From the Rochester Democrat.)

Our forests are rapidly going, while no adequate provision is being made to restore them. The State of New York has a great park full of timber in the northern wilderness, but annual fires are making havoc in that region. The great woods are probably losing more than they gain from annual growth. Wood is becoming more scarce and inaccessible every year. In many States the forests on level ground have mostly disappeared, and only remain upon high hills or mountains, which are not easily accessible. The Monetary Times tells how the forests disappear:

To make shoe pegs enough for American use consumes annually 100,000 cords of timber, and to make our lucifer matches, 300,000 cubic feet of the best pine are required every year. Last and boot trees take 500,000 cords of birch, beech, and maple, and the handles of tools 500,000 more. The baking of our bricks consume 2,000,000 cords of wood, or what would cover with forest about 50,000 acres of land. Telegraph poles already up represent 800,000 trees, and their annual repair consumes about 300,000 more. The ties of our railroads consume annually thirty years' growth of 75,000 acres and to fence all our railroads would cost $45,000 000, with a yearly expenditure of $15,000,000 for repairs.

In the Northwest there has been a very rapid destruction of the forests, and much solicitude is felt as to the future source of timber supply. Straw lumber has been manufactured to some extent in Kansas, and is said to answer the purpose very well. Straw lumber may be the lumber of the future. The refuse straw from the great grain-producing States of the West will be utilized. Instead of raising trees, the land can be devoted to grain, which may be sold, and the straw used for lumber. Coal for fuel and straw for inside finishing may relieve the pressure on the forests and give them a chance to grow.

Pine Culture on Waste Lands.

Scientific American.

Hitherto the abundance of natural timber in this country has made it easy to dispense with timber culture, and for the most part our land owners have taken little interest in such slow growing crops. This state of things, however, is rapidly passing away. The demand for special woods for manufacturing purposes is steadily and rapidly increasing, while the natural supply is diminishing and must ultimately become quite inadequate. Meanwhile there are millions of acres of acres of land suitable for timber culture and for nothing else, except poor pasturage, that our land owners are allowing to lie waste and idle for lack of a little forethought, and too frequently our would-be thrifty farmers will risk their surplus means in wild-cat speculations, promising but never yielding large and speedy returns, when the same money spent in planting timber would soon convert their worthless swamps and stony places into valuable properties.

A correspondent tells of a piece of land that was planted with walnut twenty-three years ago. This land was flooded every spring and summer, and was unfit for any ordinary cultivation. The trees are now from sixteen to twenty inches through, and have been sold for $27,000. No particulars are given as to the cost of planting the grove or the amount of attention it has had during the years of growth. There can be little doubt however, that the investment was small in comparison with the return, and the land would have otherwise remained entirely unproductive; to the contrary, the timber crop was so much clear gain. It is clear that our national resources might be enormously increased by a similar utilization by timber culture of lands which are now unused and unproductive; and the planters will find their groves a surer investment for the security of their family possessions than any savings bank deposit.

Jay Gould is going apparently to do the biggest thing yet in the way of monopoly. What is this world coming to? A few capitalists are going to bestride this earth like that old affair at Rhodes which everybody has heard of. What with consolidated railways, telegraphs, land grabs and so forth, the great mass of the people will soon be in the condition of slaves, and will have to pay toll and tribute to these earthly high priests of Mammon, just as they may see fit to settle. Won't there be an awful process of confiscation some day, when the people actually awake and say that this sort of nonsense must be dropped!

A Submarine Forest at Bombay.

(From the Indian Forester.)

In 1878, when excavations were made on the east side of the Bombay island for the Prince's Dock, the engineers found stumps of trees at a level of 12 feet and more below extreme low-tide mark, proving a considerable subsidence of the land on that side of the Bombay island. An account of this remarkable discovery was published in their records for 1878 by the Geological Survey, with a note by Mr. W. T. Blanford, which we reproduce below. But it will doubtless interest the readers of the Indian Forester to have some details relative to a subject which has a special interest for foresters. These details have been extracted chiefly from a late report by Mr. Ormiston, the resident engineer of the Bombay Port Trust.

The bottom of the dock is 45 ft. below the B. M. stone at the Bombay Town Hall, the surface being about 21 ft. below that mark and nearly 2 ft. below mean water level.

The excavation has opened out five distinct strata, the lowest of which is a rock with an extremely uneven surface. The rock (probably trap, though this is not stated in the report) was in places covered by moorum, and this by black loam. The thick loam was overlaid by a stratum of stiff blue clay from 6 to 20 ft. thick. The surface of this blue clay was nearly level, and the remains of branches, twigs, and reeds are distinctly traceable in it. The uppermost stratum was soft black clay or silt. The trees were growing on an uneven surface on the rock, and some on the moorum and black loam overlying the rock. The soil was generally very scanty, often not more than four to six inches thick, and the roots were spread out at almost right angles to the trunk. In some of the fissures of the rock there was a black muddy loam possibly the remains of decayed roots. Altogether 382 trees were found. They varied considerably in length and thickness, but appeared to be of contemporaneous growth—223 were standing upright, and 159 had fallen. The largest tree was 4 ft. 8 in. (according to the latest report 36 in. only) in girth and 46 feet in length; this was found on its side. Several others of equal girth were standing upright, but the upright trees were all broken off near the surface of the blue clay. The trees were standing at different levels, the highest being at low water level of spring tides, while the lowest was 16 ft. below low water level. Some of the forest in the Sundarbans is not much higher than the low water level of extreme spring tides. But this forest evidently had a character different from the Mangrove and Sundri Forest on the deep mud of the Sundarbans. These trees had grown on rock, or on the scanty soil overlaying that rock, and the forest probably stood above high water level. The difference at Bombay between low and high water at extreme spring tide is 16.60 feet, so that the subsidence, as indicated by the position of the trees, must have been more than 32 feet. The stumps which protruded through the blue clay into the silt were completely riddled to a short distance into the blue clay, by the perforations of the Teredo navalis or another similarly destructive animal. Lower down the holes became fewer, and many of the trees, when cut through into the blocks, showed a single hole winding towards the roots, and getting large as it approached the foot of the tree.

Of the trees found lying down, some must have drifted, as they were without branches or roots. The large fallen down tree, mentioned above, had left a complete cast of its branches in the blue clay, though the woody matter was gone.

Apparently all the trees were of the same kind except two, which it is said looked like teak trees. The wood of the others is described as fine-grained and dark, like rose-wood.

No remains of any kind were found which might have indicated human habitation; nor were any shells or other organic objects discovered in the blue clay or the ground underneath it, except one oyster-shell which was embedded in some gravel in a crevice of the underlying rock.

But it is mentioned that traces of twigs and seeds are noticed, the latter having left impressions of their shapes in the blue clay, a fine film at the outside skin in some cases adhering to the clay. None of the casts were more than half an inch wide, but they were found close together, and in a vertical position.

Below the places where these casts of seeds were traced, it is mentioned that the loam stratum was perforated with holes like rat holes, and that these were filled with very fine clay, nearly as fluid as cream. Some of the holes commenced from the surface of the loam, penetrating it for the length of a foot; others ran in a horizontal direction.

The area excavated is about thirty acres; thus there were, on an average, seven trees per acre standing. But in addition to these some of the fallen trees had probably grown on the spot. The trees were not, however, equally distributed, but were found grouped in large clusters on a portion only of the area.

Leaving to the geologist the further discussion of this most remarkable discovery, it will be well here to offer a few remarks which may be of interest to our readers. So much seems clear, that, after the land on which the trees grew had subsided below the sea, a deposit of clay gradually and slowly settled down upon the trees, and that at a later period a second desposit coming from another source, and consisting of soft silt followed.

The trees were probably killed by continued immersion in water. Soon after they had been killed, and before the deposit of stiff clay had settled around them, they were broken, and blown down by winds and waves. From what is stated in the reports which have furnished the data for these notes, it would seem that the wood is in no way petrified, but has preserved its character in a remarkable manner. It would be well to examine the structure of the wood found, and to compare it with that of Indian woods of the present day, in order to identify them, and determine whether they belong to families which are extinct, or are still found in India.

An Emperor in a Hospital.

(Letter to the London Globe.)

The Emperor, who makes it a point to leave no branch of art, science, or industry long without the encouragement of his presence, has this week being going the rounds of the Pesth hospitals in company of the physicians and surgeons attached thereto. The visits lasted in some cases three or four hours. His majesty insisted upon being informed of every detail connected with the establishment. Instruments were passed in review, and the more modern improvements of surgical apparatus carefully studied and described. Nothing was left unseen, and his majesty lingered long in the wards talking kindly to the patients. Indeed, one highly hysterical female went off into fits of excited delight, and had to be restrained till she could master her feelings. So great an interest, indeed, did Franz Joseph display, that the delighted head surgeon ventured to ask the king whether he would not like to witness an operation or two. "We have a most interesting case of caries of the leg, necessitating amputation, your majesty," said Æsclapius, smiling and rubbing his hands. "The operation is down for to-morrow, but we shall be charmed to perform it at once, if your majesty would like to see it." Then came interesting details of Esmarch, bandages, and chain-saws. Franz Joseph, however, greatly refused this seductive offer, but desired to see the poor fellow who would on the morrow occupy the operation tables. He was a young man of 28, a telegraph clerk, the chief support of his mother and sister. The sufferer began to cry at the kind and encouraging words the king spoke as he sat at his bedside. Come what may, however, he need now be under no apprehension about the future of those dear to him, for before leaving, Franz Joseph gave him his hand, with the words: "Your mother and sister shall not want."

Funeral Procession a Mile Out on Lake Erie.

At Buffalo, the other day, a funeral procession of six or eight carriages, on a very stormy day, started for a rural cemetery. They were obliged on account of the drifts to take the road that runs along the lake shore, and slowly plodded their way along what they supposed was the proper street. Finding they did not reach their destination, they stopped after a while to investigate, and found to their horror that they were one mile from land out on the frozen waters of Lake Erie. The ice was thin and treacherous, and in their bewilderment they hardly knew which way to turn, but at last, with fear and trembling and almost perished with cold, they crept back to the shore and returned with their dead to the city to defer their mournful errand to another day.

CAN a tooth that is a-king, after it is drawn out be said to have sprung from noble blood?

Our Girls.

(From the Toronto Truth.)

"Our girls" are coming grandly to the front and their state character and prospects are being discussed with a zeal, earnestness, and animation that leave nothing to be desired. Members of the rougher sex take the chief part in this discussion and say all manner of kind, patronizing or severe things about the other half of the race, according to their natural tastes, surroundings and experiences. What is to be done in the way of female education, and of female employment, what women may learn with propriety, and what rigidly ought to be kept beyond their reach, what occupations they may follow in order to earn a subsistence, and what are perfectly au feminine, and evidently intended by Providence exclusively for men, are all graciously settled with more or less of omniscience and authority by those who, if they don't believe any other passage in the Bible, have great faith in that which says, "I suffer not a woman to teach nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence." The co-education of the sexes takes up the attention of a good many, and still another batch try to settle whether or not women should have any higher education at all, and if so, what that should be, and how it ought to be conducted. And still, amid it all, men's voices are chiefly heard and the whole bearing of these is that of pitying, patronizing protective condescension as if they were discussing the best way of managing and improving a piece of property that belonged exclusively to themselves, and with which, as a matter of right, they could do very much as they pleased. Debating clubs discuss the whole question at their open meetings, and young men and lads are the exclusive orators, while the fair sex are there as admiring spectators and listeners to have their whole personnel freely considered; to be told that they cannot reason, that intellectually they are essentially inferior to their lords and masters; that they can only be educated to a certain extent, and that it is neither possible nor desirable to give them the same intellectual training which their brothers, sons, and husbands must necessarily have, if they are to accomplish anything either for themselves, or for the race. Now all this is very fine, and very considerate on the part of these masculine orators and educationists, but might it not be only reasonable that the "female brethren" should also be heard from, and that men should not talk to these as if they were household chattels. Were conveniences to be utilized exclusively and always for the glory, honour and comfort of those for whom, no doubt, they were created. The discussion will do good. It has done so already, and will do still more as it goes on. In the meantime, however, would it not be well if men, and especially young men, were not quite so cocky, and not quite so patronizing in their way of conducting the discussion? Women are fully one half of the race, and with all reverence, be it spoken, are not absolutely the private personal property of the other half. They fully contribute their share to making the world what it is, and are not to be treated as if they were either supernumeries or paupers. The Rev. Knox Little, no doubt tells them that the sum and substance of their duty is to obey their husbands when they have such, and, we suppose, their pastors and spiritual advisers when they happen to be either spinsters or widows. But Mr. Little is not Solomon, and but a very small fraction of the sisterhood will be inclined to take the law at his lips. In the meantime, it is settled beyond all controversy that women, as a whole, are not so stupid nor so useless as some would imagine. And that to a great extent as they are, so is the society in which they live. Stupid, illiterate mothers, make stupid illiterate sons, and sisters whose chief duty it is to worship, coddle and obey their brothers, generally make the objects of their idolatory, soft, selfish, conceited milksops for their pains. That there are particular spheres for women's activity and energy is, we think beyond all controversy, but it is equally evident that men have frequently invaded these and supplanted the rightful occupants. We don't believe that education, even of the highest kind, if it be really what it is called, will unfit women for occupying their particular places in the human economy. On the contrary, it will make them more efficient. In the meantime let it be kept steadily in view that women are an integral part of the race, and that it is but reasonable that they should have some efficient voice in making all those social educational and other arrangements from which their whole futures have to take their cast, colour and character. It is a matter for conference and consultation among all concerned, not for a man to settle of his own mere matter of course. We should not like to see women believe that it would be in accordance with the fitness of things that she should serve before the mast, shoe horses, or tramp to the wars. But there are surely a great many things which she might very properly do which she has not yet been allowed to attempt, and there is nothing absurd in imagining her taking a loving intelligent interest in everything connected with her own and the world's destiny, and be not the less able to cook a dinner, darn a stocking, sweep a room, or nurse a baby as occasion may require. Even as things are, 'our girls' are not such useless, thoughtless triflers as many would seem to imagine, though even if they were, who is to blame but the men, who may possibly be frightened that if women get too intelligent, the nakedness of their own intellectual territories would the more strikingly and distressingly appear, and their long claimed superiority, would be seen to be an impudent assumption and an exploded myth.

The Pedestrian and the Bloodhounds

Hearing Lord W. boast that his bloodhounds would track any living thing, by scent alone, Col. A. wagered a hundred guineas they would not track a man, and asked Mountjoy to win the wager for him, assuring the startled pedestrian there was no danger of the dogs catching him as they were slow runners, and he would take care sufficient start was allowed him; the object being simply to test their power of scent. The trial duly came off over three miles of ground round Hampstead Heath. After the dogs had sniffed at Mountjoy's legs, he made his way leisurely for half the course, when the flag was dropped and the hounds set loose. They tracked their quarry splendidly, but where 600 yards behind when Mountjoy reached the inn at the end of the course, and shut the door upon them, outside which they howled their dissatisfaction until removed by their keeper. Disbelievers in the bloodhound's scent were still unconvinced, averring that they had sighted the man for part of the journey at least; and to settle the point beyond dispute, another match was made, to be run at night, the distance this time being but a mile and a half. Unsuspicious of foul play, Mountjoy went gayly on his way, but had not accomplished more than two-thirds of the distance allowed him by the conditions, when his hair stood on end, as the cry of the dogs, hot upon his trail, reached his ears. They had been purposely slipped before the proper time, without any warning. "For one second," said he, "I stood stock still, as if I had been frozen, and then dashed away and ran, as I had never done before, and have never done since. I was in perfect training and condition, but the cold sweat broke out from every pore, and poured down my body, while my legs seemed like lead, and I trembled all over. Still I kept desperately on, while nearer came the deep hoarse bay of the hounds as the scent grew warmer, and they knew they were running up to their prey. I thought I was lost. Those few seconds were like weeks, and I wondered whether they would grip me first by the leg or fly straight at my throat. Luckily, I did not lose my head; and after the first mad burst I settled down and raced away at a pace which I knew would last the distance; but still closer and closer came the horrible cry, that sounded like my death-knell; and, in sheer desperation, I put on all the speed I could. At last I saw the lights of the lonely little inn, and my heart rose within me; but at that very instant the brutes broke out into a fierce savage yell that told me that they had sighted me at last. There was a small garden in front of the house, and as I flew up to it I saw that the gate was shut. How I did it I never knew; but, blown and exhausted with terror and the pace as I was, I cleared it, darted through the door, which fortunately stood open, and slamming it to, stood with my back against it. The lock hardly closed, when bang! bang! against the panels came my terrible pursuers; and then they lay down and yelled savagely at finding themselves baulked of their prey." As soon as he felt himself safe rage took the place of fear, and, seizing hold of a bottle, Mountjoy swore he would brain Lord W. if he entered the place, a threat he would have fulfilled had not those present got him out of the room in time to prevent most justifiable homicide.

WHY is the index [illegible] like the middle class society? Because it lies between the upper-crust and the under-bred.

Scotch Timber Trees.

From a series of articles on the "Woods and Forests of Perthshire" recently published in the Perthshire Constitutional, we gather that fir plantations occupy a large area of the woods of Scone, Lord Mansfield being the proprietor of perhaps the most extensive old Scotch fir plantations in Perthshire. Many of the trees are from 80 to 100 years of age and the quality of the timber is magnificent. At Moorward Wood there are still a number of Scotch fir trees close upon 300 years of age. Amongst these is a very remarkable tree, appropriately called "The King of the Forest," on account of its extraordinary size. It stands in the center of a section of the old wood, which was recently cut down, and is "attended" by about half a dozen trees of large size and great beauty—worthy "attendants" upon a "king"—to protect it from the fury of the elements. The "king" stands about 80 ft. in height, has a girth of 16 feet, at 3 feet from the ground, and 13 ft. 4 inches at 6 ft. from the ground, and contains about 400 cubic ft. of timber. There is no Scotch fir of similar size south of Braemar, and it is doubtful if its equal can be found even there. Moorward extends to upward of 400 acres. In the same district, says the writer, we noticed three oaks of royal mein, the first two being Quercus sessiliflora and the other a pedunculata. The former were planted in 1808, the latter a year later; and, for "plantation" trees, are very extraordinary for their age. The first has a pure stem of 56 ft., the height is over 80 ft., it girths 8 ft. 7 in. 5 ft. from the ground, and has 78 cubic ft. of timber. The second is about the same height, is seven feet in circumference, and has 94½ cubic ft. of timber. The pedunculata has a stem of 57 ft., girths 6 ft. 9 in., and has 114 cubic ft. of timber. All of these trees are quite near the two-middlestone from Perth. Here too we noticed the old Coupar-Angus Road, now covered with several ash trees, bordering on 100 ft. in height and got a glimpse of a fine line avenue, fully 600 yards long.

On the Taymount estate there are 172 acres of a valuable crop of trees, 55 years of age, principally lard and Scotch fir. In the neighborhood of Taymount House there are some fine old oaks. One of these oaks on the river side on the east march of Innernytie measures 20 ft. 10 in. in girth at 5 ft. above the ground. It has a splendid ramification of limbs, and is altogether a noble tree. It is believed to be about 500 years of age.

At Lynedoch a large acreage has been planted since the Earl of Mansfield purchased the property from the late Lord Lynedoch, about 36 years ago. The woods at Lynedoch are not only very extensive, but they are of great value. Here is a great silver fir, acknowledged to be one of the finest in Great Britain. Here, also, are two magnificent Douglasii firs, which rank among the best to be met with in this country. The silver fir is 110 ft. high. It is about 150 years old girths 13 ft. 10 in. at 3 ft. from the ground, 13 ft. 3 in. at 5 ft. from the ground, has a spread of 45 ft. and contains 425 cubic ft. of timber. The largest Douglasii fir has lost its leader, but the other is perfect in all its proportions. They were planted in 1834, and both reach an altitude of 85 ft. The one measures 9 ft. 10 in. at 3 ft. from the ground, and 9 ft. 7 in. at 5 ft. from the ground, and the other measures 9 ft. 3 in. at 5 ft. from the ground. The largest tree has a spread of branch of 70 ft., and the other a spread of 45 ft.; and the cubic feet of timber in the one is 132, and in the other 121 ft. On the west side of the estate there is a large tract of larch plantation about 50 years of age, the seed of 300 acres of which is said to have been sown by the late Lord Lynedoch when on horseback. From some points of view this plantation is so extensive as to convey the impression that the whole property is one vast forest, scarcely anything but larch being visible within a very wide range. The forest is in perfect health, and when it comes to be cut down will no doubt yield a most profitable return. Only a very inadequate idea of the value of the wood on the Lynedoch property can here be given, and it is probable that during the lifetime of the late Lord Lynedoch it was even more valuable than at present, as a large tract of valuable old timber was cut down before Lord Mansfield purchased the property. Indeed, for 10 years previous to Lord Mansfield securing the property Lord Lynedoch and his representatives were making sad havoc amongst the woods, cutting down timber to the value of about £5,000 per annum during the entire decade.

"Many hearts deplored
The fate of those old trees, and oft with pain
The traveler at this day will stop and gaze
On wrongs which nature scarcely seems to heed."

Notwithstanding this wholesale destruction, the estimated value of the wood by the exposer was as high at £52,000. The Earl of Mansfield has been at enormous expense in re-foresting the plantations which were so ruthlessly despoiled. An almost incalculable quantity of young trees, chiefly Scotch fir, have been trained and planted, and now many thriving young plantations occupy the ground rendered vacant by the despoiler.

In the neighbourhood of Logie mansion house there is a large extent of fine old timber, consisting of beech, plain oak and larch. There is also a splendid avenue of Walnut trees, and several gigantic silver firs. Some of the plane trees are remarkably large. One of them contained 300 cubic feet of timber when Lord Mansfield acquired the property. The tree is still very healthy, and now contains about 250 cubic feet of good timber. Along the banks of the Almond are some very fine Weymouth pines. At the old main approach to Logie house there is a magnificent avenue of lime and beech trees. In every respect it is perhaps the finest in Perthshire. It is fully a quarter of a mile in length,—is very wide—the trees are aged, and of large dimensions, while the foliage reaches almost to the ground. It presents altogether a grand sight, and one upon which the noble proprietor may look with no small pride.

Although the plantations on the property of the Earl of Mansfield extend to about 0,000 acres. Almost the whole of this vast forest occupies ground that would otherwise be unprofitable, and an eyesore in the landscape. Some idea of the extent of planting in recent years may be gathered from the fact that for many years after Mr. M'Corquodale became forester he planted from 300,000 to 500,000 trees every year.

Proceeding along the walk at the top of the cliff skirting the banks of the Almond, near the historical wood of Methven, we suddenly meet with a monster beech, ranking amongst the largest in the country. It is believed to be about 500 years old, and may have been a large tree when the battle of Methven Wood was fought. One almost instinctively lifts his hat on coming across such a venerable monarch of the forest. Who can recount what has transpired within its protracted life-time? How many generations of mankind have lived and died since it first sprung up in that quiet spot by the side of the classic stream on whose banks Ossian sleeps? How many storms has it weathered? Has it any history beyond its general association with the bloody struggles which took place around it? If so, it must remain a sealed book forever. The tree strikes one all the more forcibly that it confronts him unexpectedly. The walk on the summit of the cliff is not fringed with trees remarkable for their size—coppice wood and young trees generally predominating on both sides. We therefore walk leisurely along the footpath without the slightest expectation of seeing anything noteworthy for some little time, but a sharp turn to the right, and a few steps onwards, bring us instantly to a standstill, in mute admiration of the gigantic vegetable wonder before us. The tree has every appearance of being over 100 ft. in height, over-topping by far many immense trees in the neighbourhood. At 1 ft. from the ground it measures 21 ft. 10 in., and at 5 ft. from the ground it measures 14 ft. 9 in. It has a splendid bole of 20 ft., and divides into five great limbs, each of which would be a large tree by itself. As yet it shows no signs of decrepitude, but seems to be endowed with perpetual youth, the whole tree being in luxuriant health and foliage. It is, unfortunately, closed in to a large extent with coppice wood, and its huge proportions are not, therefore, shown to the best advantage; but this obstruction may, in course of time, removed, and the giant displayed in all his beauty. Almost opposite the beech to which we have been referring is a very fine oak, measuring 11 ft. 10 in. at 1 ft. from the ground, and 8 ft. 9 in. at 5 ft. from the ground, with a bole of 30 ft. Close by the banks of the river is a beautiful plane, 11 ft. 6 in. at 1 ft. from the ground, and 9 ft. 1 in. and 5 ft. from the ground. The bole is about 20 ft., and the branches spread far over the river.

A YOUNG city fellow bought a farm last winter. He had a fine orchard of about two hundred apple trees, and a few weeks ago he tapped every one of them for cider.

The Widow.

In middle-class Spain, the [illegible] her servant "my daughter," [illegible] on a kind of free-and-easy footing, much authority on the mistress, and certainly little discipline on the part of the servant; and the [illegible] herself, since she has little to do, dusts with her little beno or broom made of strips of cloth, [illegible] room. "It was 'ours' once," [illegible] "it was his and mine; now, it is mine!" Yet she has never [illegible] with all her dusting and [illegible] never moved his things; [illegible] floor in the Army, her husband, lo, there, on its accustomed [illegible], though he were likely to come and put it on, and pass out, with a [illegible] ty and a kind good-bye, to the [illegible] or the parade ground, there hangs his sword at his bed-head; there, on the dressing-table burns his star of [illegible]; there are his boots, his uniform [illegible] no? "Ah!" she weeps, as his [illegible] day comes round, "pobre [illegible] bueno que ha sido a mi" ("Ah, [illegible] little fellow; how good he was to [illegible]. And then, in a flood of scalding [tears], in that lonely room, she kneels and prays to La Virgen de los Dolores. [illegible] pushes away her simple meal, the egg, the puchero, the cup of black [cof]fee: she wanders up and down the [illegible] "Ah! it is so lonely without [illegible]" she says, and, at night, her heart [illegible] ing with its load of troubles, she [cries] herself to sleep, her crucifix clasped [to] her breast, her pillow wet with [tears]. Sunshine, thank God, in Spanish [sor]row, often bursts upon the glistening landscape ere the clouds have [passed] away, but the clouds return; they [come] back at the recurrence of every [illegible] his, the lost one's, saint: at every [sight] of his little things; there is not, [as in] English sorrow, a steady cloudy [sea]son, and then sunlight, bright and steady if somewhat mellowed and autumnal in its glow.

The Burial Place of the Prince Consort.

The beautiful burial place of the Prince Consort has been erected at the Queen's sole expense, and cost about £200,000. It lies in the midst of shrubs in the gardens of Frogmore, many of the trees have an inscription telling when they were planted by various members of the royal family. The mausoleum is a work of the [illegible] magnificence. The richest Venetian mosaics, by D. Salviani, are employed in ceilings and walls. Magnificent paintings adorn each transept, the subjects being the Nativity, Crucifixion and Resurrection of our Lord. Marble panelling, bas-reliefs in statuary marble, and others in terra-cotta, are around, and various texts in English and in German meet the eye. The whole floor is of the most beautiful inlaid polish marble, and in the centre stands the sarcophagus containing the mortal remains of our Queen's beloved consort, Albert, "the Good." [At the] four [corners] kneeling angels, with clasped hands and opened wings, at each corner, executed by Marochetti, with a recumbent statue of the Prince, one of the last works of this sculptor. The spotless marble figure of the Prince is a perfect likeness. He is clad in [his] military uniform, with the mantle of the Order of the Garter round him. [It] lies but upon one-half of the vast sarcophagus, and is a reminder of the [wish] of the royal widow, who, in erecting this memorial, looked on to the time when, her own life ended and her work accomplished, she should be laid to rest by the side of him she ever mourns. [As] group after group entered the precincts and passed to the left of the Prince Consort's tomb, they stopped to admire another exquisite memorial placed in this sacred spot within the last year. It is Boehm's statue of H. R. H. Princess Alice, Duchess of Hesse, who is represented lying asleep with her child in her arms—that child whom she had so devotedly nursed to its last hour. Mother and child are like life, and the inscription well says of the mother, "she counted her life dear unto herself." Many fresh wreaths had been laid upon both those tombs by the Queen and Royal Family before the public were admitted.—The Queen.

An Audience of Queen Elizabeth.

Amongst the archives at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Paris is a curious document, and account [by] Hurault de Maisse of a mission upon which he went as Ambassador to the English Court in 1597. His first interview with Elizabeth took place on the 8th of December in that year, and is described with graphic minuteness. One of the court carriages came for the Ambassador of Henry IV., and conducted him to the Thames, where a boat was awaiting him, which immediately put off, and deposited him at Whitehall. He was then conducted by the Lord Chamberlain through a dark corridor—the obscurity of which made a great impression on his mind—to a private apartment in which was the Queen. Her Majesty was sitting in a low chair at the top of the room, alone and retired, at a distance from the crowd of lords and ladies in the lower part of the chamber. When he had made his reverence she advanced five or six paces to meet him, and took both his hands, after he, on his part, had humbly kissed the lower part of her dress. She then excused herself for not having received him before, by alleging an inflammation on the right side of her face. "She also made me her excuses," adds the Ambassador, "for being found in her night-dress, and began to reproach her attendants, saying, 'What will these gentlemen think to see me dressed in this guise? I am truly grieved that they should see me in this state.'" The gown in question was a close-fitting dress of white carnation, with a profusion of silver gauze. "It had open sleeves lined with red taffetta, and was garnished with other little sleeves which hung down as far as the ground, and which she kept tying and untying from time to time. She had on her head a garland of rubies and pearls, and underneath a great thick wig, of a reddish color, with an infinity of gold and silver curl-papers, and a few pearls which hung down over her forehead."

WASTE OF TIMBER.—A correspondent writing from central Missouri, says of the farming community of that section: "The waste of timber is appalling. They girdle and burn up magnificent forests of oak, hickory, ash and linden, to make room for new wheat and corn fields, while the old ones are not half cultivated. They split elegant young walnut and cherry into millions of common rails, to fence lands worth only $8, $10 and $20 per acre, and then wonder why they must pay three prices for walnut furniture from factories a thousand miles away. They even put walnut logs into sluice-ways, cabins, pig troughs, cordwood and wash-outs, without a thought that the timber famine will appal them twenty years hence.

FACTS AND INCIDETS.

THERE is a goose at Littlecote Farm, in Wiltshire, England, which is known to be nearly ninety years old, and may be a good deal older. It was presented to the father of its present owner on his tenth birthday (in 1806), and it was then considered aged.

AN English doctor says that in large cities night air is often the best and purest air to be had in twenty-four hours, and that fully one-half of all the diseases afflicting humanity are occasioned by people sleeping with their windows shut.

A STOCK company was formed of seven boys of Belleville, Ind., for the purpose of sawing up railroad iron into chunks and selling it to junk men. They raised a capital of $6, with which they bought some tools, and began operations. One rail had not been prepared for market, however, before the shareholders were all arrested. The concern is insolvent.

ONE of the officers of the steamship City of Berlin states that he has received the current from a Siemen's dynamo-electric machine through the legs, trunk, left arm, thumb, and one finger. He says he did not like the sensation, but that he could have endured it if necessary, although the current was capable of giving four lights of four hundred candle power each.

Sir Saville Lumley, the British Minister at Brussels, who was for many years at Washington as First Secretary and Charge d'Affaires, seems to have an easy time at that capital of a quite little kingdom. His chief duty seems to be the transmission of some special biscuits from the Queen of the Belgians to her sister Queen of England. Victoria took a fancy to them when travelling in Germany, and is passionately fond of them.

A WRITER in Nature says that before the voyage of the Challenger scarcely thirty deep-sea fishes were known; that, although this number has now been very much increased, yet no new types of families have been discovered, and that, although perfectly novel and very interesting modifications of certain organs have been met with, there has been nothing more discovered than what might have been expected from what was known previously of the group.

Ireland is still a seething caldron, but it would seem more and more likely that Gladstone will be able to apply an effective remedy. The proverbial violence and wrongheadeduess of Milesian agitators are helping the authorities wonderfully, and bringing English public opinion, both Conservative and Liberal, to back Gladstone's repressive measures almost as a unit. Will the three Fs be carried with equal ease and determination?

THE following incident, related by a member from the Black Hills, as having occurred at a Yankton church, may be true, but lacks confirmation: "But I pass," said the minister in dismissing one theme of the subject to take up another. "Then I make it spades!" yelled a member of the committee on charitable and penal institutions from northern Dakota, who was dreamily engaged in an imaginary game of euchre. He went out on the next deal, assisted by a bald-headed deacon with a full band of clubs.

THE floods in Holland have caused wide-spread devastation and suffering. Dykes at Nieuwkuyk that resisted storm and wave for 80 years succumbed to the tempests of the wild winter, and a vast area, containing hundreds of thousands of acres and a population of 90,000 persons, was flooded. Add to this severe cold, and it is easy to form a conception of the suffering that ensued. Many houses were torn from their foundations, others fell in, and in many the inmates were made prisoners in the garrets and on the roofs, where they were subjected to all the pangs of hunger and exposure. The catastrophe was owing to the neglect of the Government to maintain the dyke in proper condition.

Death has of late been very busy with our public men. At this rate the older class will soon all have disappeared. Alexander Mackenzie is almost the only one on the one side and Sir John Macdonald on the other. These two are now looked up to as the Nestors of our politicians. And yet, according to the British standard, neither of them is an old man. They are but boys compared with Gladstone or Beaconsfield, and so have been all those who have died during the past year or two. Very few of these have been above sixty, or if so only a year or two. Men, at such ages in Britain, are thought only at their prime. Here they are regarded as perfectly ancient and venerable. And then how soon they are forgotten after they are dead. Who now either thinks or speaks on Sir George Cartier or George Brown, or Holton, or Christie? Luc Letellier has been talked of during the past few days and some have tried to show that he was a martyr and "hounded" to death. Before a month is past nobody, except his most intimate friends, will ever mention his name. I am almost tempted to play Corporal Trim, but I won't; the more especially as no Uncle Toby is exactly come-at-able, and the readers of TRUTH might not thank me for dabbling in pathos, and prosing over the inevitable forgetfulness that awaits us all.—Toronto Truth.

HIS VICTORIA CROSS.

By the author of "A STRANGE WEDDING-EVE," "CLARE STANHOPE'S DIAMONDS," &c.

CHAPTER II. CONTINUED.

It was such a sweet silvery voice, with just the slightest trace of an Irish accent. The last words were spoken with shocked reproach as the little figure came shyly from behind a screen and stood still with downcast eyes.

"What! you are afrid of me, my child?" said Colonel McLeod, half laughing.

He took her hands and kissed her too, and drew her forward to the light. She was a pretty girl, with likeness enough to the elder to prove her relationship, but with not one tithe of Cecil's beauty and lacking Cecil's winning grace and nameless charm—at least so Colonel McLeod thought; and he was a keen physiognomist.

"I am afraid I have not given you much of a welcome home," he said, putting Cecil back into her seat and bringing forward a chair for Alice, who had received his caress shyly and in silence, but who was now furtively scanning the tall erect figure in the glittering uniform. "I was obliged to be present to-day at the manœuvres, or I should have come to meet you myself. But you have been well taken care of, I hope?"

"Oh, yes, thank you, Colonel McLeod!" said Cecil, a little shyly, but without the slightest awkwardness of manner; and she was fast losing a certain awe she had felt at first. "And Janet was so kind to us in Ireland."

"She took us shopping in Dublin," remarked Alice, with wide-open eyes of delight at the recollection, "and bought us ever so many things. She said we were to be the Colonel's wards."

"Ah, little maid, you find your tongue when we come to the shopping!" said McLeod, smiling. "Janet was quite right—you are my wards; and I will do my best to take care of you."

Cecil raised her large eyes again with a half-wistful look; they expressed a mute gratitude that her lips could not frame into words. She wanted to say too much; her heart was full of unuttered thanks for all the Colonel's kindness; but Alice, whose shyness seemed to have quite disappeared, came to her aid with an account of the discomfort of the passage by sea.

"I was ill, but Cecil wasn't, nor was Janet. I wanted to stop at Holyhead till I was well, but Janet wouldn't; and we went on to London. Oh, I like London, Colonel McLeod! Why don't you live there?"

"Because my duties keep me at Ridinghurst," said the Colonel, who was amused. It seemed so strange to him to be listening to a girl's chatter. "I am Colonel of a regiment stationed at Hyde."

"Oh, like papa was at Cork before he left the Army! Did you know papa very well, Colonel McLeod?"

"He was a very old friend of mine, my dear," answered Loris McLeod; and Cecil noticed the slight change in his tone as he spoke. "We served together once."

"Papa used to talk of you so often, Colonel McLeod," said Cecil softly; and Alice exclaimed ergerly—

"Wasn't it in the Indian Mutiny? Papa was there, and he used to wear a lot of medals. You don't have any, Colonel McLeod. Why don't you wear them so—on your coat?"

There was a momentary pause, and a slight tremor shook the Colonel's tall figure. Then he answered quietly—

"Your father was in action after that, my child. I came home before the Mutiny closed."

"But why did you?" persisted Alice; she had no idea that she was implanting a thorn with every word.

"I suppose because I was not wanted, my dear. What a number of questions!" said the Colonel, smiling, and moving away a little from the glare of the firelight.

Cecil glanced across at her sister warningly; she had an instinctive knowledge that, for some reason, the Colonel did not wish to talk about India; but Alice never heeded any warning when she wanted to be heard; her shyness was skin-deep.

"Couldn't you get medals at home then?" she asked.

"No; only on active service."

"Wouldn't you like to have the Victoria Cross? Oh, shouldn't I, if I was a soldier!" cried Alice. "Why didn't you, Colonel McLeod?"

"Don't be so silly, Alice!" interposed Cecil quickly, vexed beyond measure at her sister's forwardness. But the Colonel only said, with a half-smile that was strangely sad and sweet—

"It is not given to every one, Alice, to win that which is the highest reward a soldier can win. If a man wears that on his breast, he may indeed be proud. But I mustn't keep you talking here now," he added; "it is getting late, and I am all covered with dust. I ought to apologise," he said to Cecil, "for coming into a lady's presence just as I am; but I would not wait."

"I am so glad you did not," said Cecil naively. "I wanted so to see you soon; it doesn't seem strange now we know you."

"Thank you, my child—" and the Colonel smiled down upon the winsome face. "I only want you to feel at home here, because this is your home now; you will soon fall into new ways. Happily, young things like you can adapt yourselves to circumstances."

"Shall we not be in your way, Colonel McLeod?" said Cecil wistfully; and she put her little soft hand into his. "Will you tell us everything you like us to do, or not to do? Because, you know"—and the girl spoke earnestly as she saw that he was about to speak—"we haven't been brought up quite like the girls you know, I am sure. We lived all alone with papa; and I am afraid you will think us very wild, and perhaps we shall often vex you. But I should like so to try to do exactly what you would wish."

This was said with a subdued impulsivness, while the girl's eyes sparkled with earnest feeling.

"Do you think I am so very strict then, Cecil?" asked Colonel McLeod, laying one hand on her shoulder and bending down a little. "Perhaps I can shape my life to yours. At any rate I make you this promise—when you are very much in my way, I will tell you. Will that do?"

There was some latent mischief in the glance he gave the girl that reassured her and lightened the burden which had been pressing on her heart. She smiled brightly, and Alice said meditatively—

"I think it would be rather nice to be your ward. Mrs. Sullivan said we must 'mind our p's and q's,' because military households are very strict; but I don't think so; you are very kind."

The Colonel laughed outright.

"Thanks for your commendation," he said: "but I don't think I am very strict. I sha'n't quarrel with you for riding the ponies bare-backed, for instance, for sliding down the balusters instead of coming down on your feet. Those are some of your tricks, I can see," as a merry glance passed from Cecil to Alice. "Well, well, be young as long as you can, only don't let the ponies throw you."

"We can stick on anyhow," said Cecil, laughing; "only I expect your horses are more frisky than our poor old Mick."

"Well, you won't want to ride bare-backed, I dare say," remarked McLeod, with a smile; "saddles and riding habits are the fashion in Hyde. You do ride in a civilized manner, I suppose?"

"Oh, yes! We used to before—before papa lost his money," said Alice. "Shall we ride, Colonel McLeod?"

"Of course. There is Janet to take you off to dress for dinner."

Alice's eyes opened and her cheeks flushed, how grand that was, she thought, to dress for dinner! Alice went out with Janet; but the Colonel detained Cecil as she was leaving the room.

"A moment my child," he said. "I wanted to say a few words to you. Your father was the oldest, the dearest friend I had. We met but little for the last ten years of his life. I did not know that he had met with reverses until the letter came that asked me to be your guardian; but remember that all I can do for his children will never repay all that he gave me—in former days. For he gave what neither gold nor interest will buy—trust. Therefore you must think yourself at home at Ridinghurst; you are both my charges. I may fail to make you happy; but it shall not be for want of striving."

He paused a second, and then added in a lighter tone—

"Run off now, and dress. If there is anything about your rooms you would like changed, or if you don't like them, come to me and tell me; or if"—half playfully, half wistfully—"you are afraid of me, Mrs. Grant will not frighten you."

"I shall never be afraid of you, Colonel McLeod," answered Cecil, with simple earnestness. "I don't know how to say all that is in my heart. You will not think me ungrateful, will you?"

No, my child, there is an endless promise of all you would say in those wistful eyes of yours," said the Colonel softly; and he dropped her hand and drew back from the door for her to pass out.

* * * * * * *

"Shall we dress for dinner every evening, Janet?" asked Cecil when Janet had arrayed her in a long black robe of some glossy material, cut at the neck, so as to leave the fair white throat bare; and the young lady surveyed herself in her fashionably-made and stylish attire with half-pleasurable innocent wonder. Could she be the same Cecil Verner who used to race about Rocklands bare-footed, if she so pleased, and to whom dressing for dinner was the rarest of occurrences?

"If you always dine with the Colonel, Miss Verner," answered Janet, fastening back, with a jet arrow, the rich masses of silky chestnut hair that fell in unrestrained freedom over her shapely shoulders; "which I suppose you will. Military gentlemen, you know, miss, always like to see their ladies dressed well. There now, Miss Verner, you look beautiful! My Lady Agatha Cane, whom I used to dress every night o her life, never looked half so distinguished.

"Why, we are Verners!" said Miss Alice, tossing her head.

Cecil laughed a little and moved to the fireplace, and rested one little daintily-shod foot on the bright steel fender.

"It is nice, Janet," cried Alice, "to be the Colonel's ward! Why, we shall be great ladies! Being a person's ward is like being a daughttr of the house, isn't it? Only of course Colonel McLeod isn't old enough. Isn't he splendid, Cecil? Only I wish he had medals."

"You mustn't say that to him, Alice," said Cecil gravely. "You were very rude this evening. Couldn't you see that the Colonel didn't want to talk about India?"

"Oh, nonsense! I never came near any one like you, Cecil. You always see ever so many things that no one else ever does," said Alice crossly. "Janet, why haven't I got bracelets like Cecil?"

"Your sister, Miss Alice, is older than you," replied Janet. She had long since decided that "Miss Alice" was a vain and heartless young lady, and prophesied trouble in the future for her. "Now you are both ready. Do you know your way to the drawing-room, Miss Verner?"

"Yes, thanks," answered Cecil; but Alice, seized with a sudden fit of shyness, looked frightened.

"Do come with us, Janet," she whispered. "Don't you feel funny, Cecil?"

"Strange, a little," said the girl, glancing at Janet, and smiling. "But it's silly; so we mustn't give way to it. Papa would say, 'Alice, a soldier's daughter should fear nothing.'"

"Ah, you'll be the girl after the Colonel's own heart!" murmured Janet, as she turned away to arrange the room.

During dinner, Colonel McLeod found, as he had expected, that, as soon as the strangeness of entirely novel circumstances had worn off, Cecil Verner was not at a loss for conversation, that she had read a great deal and observed keenly, and that she had made as much use as possible of the limited opportunities she had had. She was full of Irish vivacity and wit, and was impulsive and generous. The Colonel discovered, in the course of conversation, that her special talent was music, and he instantly made a mental resolve that she should have the best of masters from London. She had had lessons, she told him, from a master who visited Ballyshowan, and she played a little.

"You would not think it anything," she said—they were in the drawing-room now—"but he always taught me good music. But, Colonel McLeod," she added archly, "I can sing dozens of Irish songs, and croon a lovely keena just like an old Irishwoman."

"You can look saucy," returned McLeod, laughing. "Will you play me something, or are you too tired?"

She flushed and half opened her lips, but she evidently resolutely put down whatever trepidasion she felt as "silly." Miss Verner had a lofty contempt for all "silliness," and she crossed to the piano, which the Colonel opened for her.

"Oh," she said, with a deep sigh of satisfaction, as she sat down before the instrument and touched the keys caressingly, "what a glorious piano! I can't play well enough for it. Please will you not be very severe, Colonel McLeod?"

He only smiled and went and sat in a distant part of the room, but where he could see her still. As he was a good musician he was well able to judge of another's powers.

Cecil played several pieces with delicacy and grace, and the Colonel saw at once that she had only wanted cultivation. Crossing to her side and laying his hand on her shoulder he told her so.

After that Loris McLeod made her sing, and he discovered that she had an exquisitely pure voice. Then Alice was called upon. She declared she could sing, but hated playing. She had never practised, it was such hard work. Cecil would stay in-doors for hours while she was scampering round the paddock on Mick's bare back. Nevertheless she was made to sing and play, while Cecil wandered round the room looking at the pictures, and Loris McLeod's dark eyes, half hidden by the drooping lashes, were resting on the graceful girlish figure in its closely-fitting black robe.

So the evening passed until it was time for the two young travellers to retire. As the Colonel opened the door for them, he had for each the same gentle "Good-night, my child; Heaven keep you," the same gentle handclasp, yet for Cecil there was a softer light in the dark grey eyes and a more tender cadence in the sweet voice.

"I like our Colonel very, very much," said Cecil gravely after a long meditation over the fire that night when Janet had left them. "I like him to say 'my child,' don't you, Allie?"

"Yes, he's very nice," replied Alice, springing into bed; "he's going to give me a beautiful new riding-habit."

"You are always thinking of clothes, Allie," reproved Cecil.

She laid her head in silence on the pillows, and half sighed; but very soon the white lids drooped and her dreams that night were all about Colonel McLeod.

CHAPTER III.

"I say, Chalmers, who on earth are those girls the Chief has with him? I met them out riding to-day. I thought you said he wasn't married and hadn't any sisters."

The question was asked by Lieutenant Fairleigh of Captain Chalmers at the mess one day about a week after the arrival of the Verners at Ridinghurst. The young Lieutenant had only just been gazetted to the —th Lancers, so he was, as yet, ignorant of many matters which were well known at Hyde. For Colonel McLeod had taken care to inform his acquaintances that the Verners were his wards, daughters of a brother officer.

"So I did, my son," responded Captain Chambers leisurely; "I thought everybody knew that those girls were the Colonel's wards. The elder girl's a beauty."

"So she is. Are they living at Ridinghurst?"

"Of course. You needn't open your eyes Teddy. The Colonel isn't so young as he looks, and Miss Verner's about seventeen, I believe, and one of those wild Irish girls. Besides, there's some old women up there to play propriety."

"He never seems to go into society," remarked the new comer.

"He doesn't care to go where he might get the cold shoulder," replied Captain Chalmers ... "You know we service men are apt to be prejudiced, and some fellows have never forgotten that Gheratpoor affair."

"Tisn't likely," said Major Rhodes curtly, "when it is not forgotten at the Horse Guards."

"More's the shame," put in Lord Kennedy, a captain in the Life Guards, who had come over from the next county, where he was visiting, but who was the guest of the —th Lancers that night.

"What's he done or not done?" inquired Teddy Fairleigh, mystified.

"Oh, it's an old story now!" answered Kennedy. "You were in petticoats when it all took place; it made a precious flare-up at the time."

"And did for the Chief," added Surgeon-Major Ferguson, with a half-sigh; "I was a youngster myself at the time—my first campaign in fact. I remember young McLeod, as brave a lad as ever drew breath, anxious for glory and to win the highest distinction. Such hopes there were about him!"

"Else he had never been trusted in such a position as that," said the Major, sipping a glass of Lafitte. "It only shows how little one can guage a man's fitness for command from ——"

"But, my dear fellow," interrupted Ferguson, "the oddest part of it was that McLeod had shown such aptitude for command, such cool-headedness and absolute indifference to danger, young as he was."

"My idea was," remarked Kennedy, "from reading about it and so on, that McLeod thought it madness to keep the place—didn't like the idea of being killed like a rat in a hole, with all the chances he had of getting distinction, and so disobeyed orders."

"No one ever charged him with want of courage," observed Chalmers; "at least, no one that I ever heard of. Besides, do you remember, Rhodes, that expedition against the frontier tribes, up in Rhotee, an out-of-the-way affair, that made no sort of noise here; but it was a masterpiece of strategy; and, by Jove, if any other fellow in the service had performed that rescue of one of his troopers, he'd have had the Victoria Cross! But McLeod was passed over, of course."

"Well, whatever his fault," remarked Lord Kennedy, "I do think a man ought to be allowed to expiate it in twenty years; they've never given him a chance to wipe out the stain, you see. It's very hard a fellow is to be ostracised at head-quarters for ever. But they're such a set of martinets!" added his lordship disdainfully,

"This youngster is dying to hear all about it," said Chalmers, laughing. "But I am not sure it's right to rake up tales about your Chief, Teddy."

"Pooh, it's all public. Generations of messes have talked it over," remarked Major Rhodes, twisting his moustache rather fiercely.

"Satisfy his appetite for scandal, Ferguson," said Chalmers; "you know all about it—you're a contemporary of the Chief."

"Oh, ay, I remember it well enough!" said the Doctor. "It was a puzzle to me then, and it's a puzzle to me now. Well, Fairleigh, it was in this way—

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

MATTERS DRAMATIC.

The criticism in St. Louis upon Sarah Bernhardt is that her dresses do not fit her.

Lord Wentworth, Byron's grandson, is very unattractive in appearance and manner.

The baby in "Hearts of Oak" costs the management $40 a week. It is the child of Mrs. Dear, a resident of Cleveland, who receives $20 a week for the little one's services, and has all her own and the baby's expenses paid besides. The child is now six months old, and has been on the stage three months.

The long illness which preceded Sothern's death seriously disarranged the the theatrical business in the United States. Time was reserved for him in all the large cities, and, as he would be sure to draw well if he appeared, no other engagements were made until the latest possible moment. Travelling combinations then rushed in to fill the gaps, abandoning the smaller towns in which they had contracted to appear. Thus plans were upset right and left.

Fanny Davenport essayed the part of "Camille" in a St. Louis theatre last week. Naturally, from her size she invited a comparison with Clara Morris, Bernhardt, and Modjeska; but, although she brought to the part an appearance of exuberant health, foreign to the typical "Camilles" of our stage, by the skilful use of drapery she contrived to conceal to a considerable degree her portliness; and the wasting away of life in the death scene was represented by the modulations of her voice. While strong in the emotional parts of the play, Miss Davenport seemed much too healthy to cough her life away at the loss of a lover.

There has been trouble in the Salvini dramatic company. L. R. Shewell, who was the stage manager, and played "Iago" to to the star's "Othello," was adversely criticised by the press of the various cities where he appeared. He claimed that his bad performance of the part was due to the fact that Salvini insisted upon subordinating everything to his own purposes, thus giving nobody else on the stage an opportunity to do well. When the company went to Boston, the home of Showell, he asked to be relieved from duty in that city, in order to escape the pens of the critics. Manager Stetson, discharged him permanently, and a lawsuit is the upshot. Salvini has published the following letter to the unfortunate actor: "The cause for which your contract has been annulled was not my dissatisfaction toward you. I was, on the contrary, so well satisfied with the manner in which you discharged your duties as an artist, that I have done all in my power to dissuade Mr. Stetson from his resolve. I also regret profoundly that I shall not have the pleasure to call you my companion for the rest of my artistic tour."

The Pacific Ocean Aflame.

Ships in the neighborhood of the Sandwich Islands can now witness one of the grandest spectacles that earth affords. The Mauna Loa is again belching forth its fiery torrents. The mighty forces imprisoned under the beds of the Pacific are finding vent through this volcanic cone. Mauna Loa is a volcano situated on the island of Hawaii. It is 13,700 feet high and is marked by two distinct craters, one at the summit, and the other, Kilauea, at a somewhat lower level. This island has been the scene of several marvelous exhibitions of volcanic fury. There was a great eruption in 1840 and in 1843; but these were exceeded in August, 1855, when the flow of fire, smoke, and lava continued until July, 1856. The evidence of this torrent was discovered for a distance of over sixty miles. The floor of the great crater Kilauea resembled, it was said, a lake of fire which had been scooped one thousand feet deep, and covered an area of twenty-eight square miles. This enormous vent relieves the great basin of the Central Pacific, the rim of which rests upon a volcanic formation, set with volcanoes all around. It is notable that most of the volcanoes are under the floor of the ocean, and only show themselves on islands cast up from the great deep. The evidence of violent disturbance all over the earth points to the time when the present land was under the surface of the water, and subject to volcanic action. It was the commingling of fire and water which one time or other distorted or depressed the surface of this earth. This new eruption may exceed any which has preceded it. It calls attention to the Sandwich Islands, once populated by a race of handsome, simple-minded savages. We have civilized and poisoned out of existence nine-tenths of the former inhabitants of these islands. Some day the islands will belong to the United States. The climate is temperate the year around, and with coolie labor they will grow immense crops of coffee and sugar-cane.

Not everybody will be able to see the Nautch girls, but everybody can get a pretty good idea of their dance by putting two hornets down the housemaid's back.

THE English Registrar-General estimates that the population of London will be found to have increased from 3,253,260 in 1871 to 3,707,130 in the middle of 1881. WEATHER.—Full complement here.

Roads bad since thaw, and now we see the head of the family eyeing with delight that piece of kindling wood just emerging from the embrace of winter.

We understand that our worthy citizen, Mr. W. Guy, has rented his blacksmith shop.

Some of our friends here see the "comet" almost every night. Watch for the "comic" boys.

A literary and Debating Society, for the purpose mutual improvement by of means of readings, recitations, debates, essays, &c., has been established here, and has met with great success. An organization meeting was held on the 7th of January, at which 28 persons became members, and the following staff of officers were enstalled for the quarter:—President, J. W. H. Milne; 1st Vice-President, George W. Allister; 2nd Vice do, R. W. Heron; 3rd Vice do. W. Inkster; Sec-Treas., E. J. J. Ferguson; Counciller, W. Ross. Regular weekly meetings have since been held with increasing prosperity. Sixty names are now upon the roll. Several members formerly belonged to other societies. Two debates have been already on the programme, the last one being—"Resolved, That water is more useful to man than fire." Decision in favor of the affirmative. SCRIPTO.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me space in your columns for a few remarks in answer to a communication in your issue of two weeks since, signed John Ford. There are some things in Mr. F.'s letter with which I agree, viz: the procuring of a proper quality of stock. This is very desirable, as every one knows that if the cattle are not of the right breed for slaughtering purposes, a good and profitable yield cannot be had. But what I particularly wish to notice, is Mr. Ford's desire to impute something to the local butchers of which they are not guilty. He says, "I think they would rather see the country filled up with rough, scrubby cattle, just the sort no other man would think of buying for the foreign or better market, and by that means they would have every facility for getting what they wanted for just about nothing, and still sell it at a pretty big figure." Now did ever anyone ever hear such nonsense? Mr. Ford evidently does not know what he is talking about, for if he did, he never would pen such bosh. The fact is, the local butchers, as do all butchers, wish to procure the best possible meat for their customers, thereby satisfying them, and being creditable to themselves; but so long as the farmer does not furnish the quality, can it be wondered at that the butcher does not do better. I would recommend Mr. Ford to do as he suggests, namely, procure better stock than he does at present, and he may rely upon it that the local butchers will be pleased to pay the highest price, and should there be too much for local consumption, he will find ready sale for it to drovers, who of course do not come here to purchase from the fact, that they know Mr. Ford has no suitable cattle to dispose of. In conclusion, I would say to Mr. Ford, improve your stock; and you may rely on a sure and ready sale; but so long as you breed the scrubby cattle you do at present, you must not expect butchers to pay a high price, and furnish superior meat; and further, Mr. Ford will be conferring a great boon on the local butchers, as they will, when good stock can be had near home, certainly not go a distance for it, as they have at present. Thanking you for the space occupied, I remain, Mr. Editor, Yours, &c.

SIR,—I noticed in the columns of the STANDARD of the 4th inst, over the signature of Nemo, an account of an enjoyable affair which took place at New England P. M. Church on the 1st inst., being a continuation of a Tea Meeting held at the same place the previous Thursday evening. This statement is true; but Nemo also states that the Tea Meeting was partly a failure. Now I would like to ask him in what sense it was a failure? It was admitted by all that the Tea Meeting was in every way a success, and the more enjoyable of the two.—The speaking was far ahead of that given on the 1st, and of a higher order, with the exception of Cartwright and R. Abercrombie, who were not present at the Tea meeting. The singing also was fully equal to that rendered on the 1st, if not better. The failure was not in the smallness of the congregation, for the church was full, any addition to the number would have made it [illegible] for these present. [illegible] Nemo writes again I trust he will make himself acquainted with the facts, and write accordingly. JUNO.

Canadian Pacific Railway.

Speech of Mr. Sproule, M. P.

(DELIVERED IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS, OTTAWA, 25TH JANUARY, 1881, AND REPUBLISHED BY REQUEST.)

MR. SPROULE. The importance of this subject is the only excuse which I have for troubling the House at this late stage of the debate. The question is one of the utmost importance to the country from whatever point of view it is considered. If we consider the fact that the road will be a great commercial thoroughfare through a country that it is over 4,000 miles long, that it will carry the trade of an area of country that consists of over 250 millions of acres of land, we cannot fail to regard the subject as of surpassing interest to the people of this country. Viewed simply as a financial question it is also important. We have now a national debt of $147,000,000, and when we consider that the amount which will be expended in the undertaking before it is finished will equal if not exceed that amount, we must regard the question as one of great importance. In vieving this subject the question which naturally suggests itself to our minds is wether we are paying too much for the road under this contract or not—whether we will get an ample return for the expenditure. As a rule it is only by the comparison of work by work that we are able to determine whether a certain piece of work is too expensive. Now we have a road on this continent which, I think by its similarity to this, by its passing through a section of country very similar to that through which this passes, by the fact that its condition at a certain period of its history has been selected as a standard for the building of this road, and by the fact that it was built by the same class of capitalists, affords us a very fair means of comparison. The Union Pacific is only 1,029 miles long—not one-half as long as the Canadian Pacific Railway—and according to a return which was made to the Secretary of the Interior, that road cost $112,259,360, or an average of $113,110 a mile. The Central Pacific, which is also a road very much similar to ours, cost $114,388 per mile; and as we can ascertain very closely what the Canadian Pacific Railway will cost under the present scheme, we can very easily make a comparison with these two roads. We have another mode of arriving at a comparison. I find from a return given in Trout's "Railways of Canada," that the average cost of railways in the Dominion per mile is $56,532. The average in the United States is a little more, $60,425. I think when we make these comparisons we can easily see that we are getting a very good bargain for the country. If we take the lands at $2 per acre, which seems to be by general admission a fair valuation, we have $50,000,000 in lands; we have $25,000,000 in cash: we have $28,000,000 for the completed road, making in all $103,000,000. Now when we find that the Union Pacific, which is only 1,029 miles long, cost $112,000,000, and our road which is 2,700 miles long, costs only $103,000,000, I think it will be admitted we are getting good valve for our money. The average cost of railways in the Dominion is $56,532 per mile; that of the Canadian Pacific Railway is only about $28,888, so that viewed in that light too, the result is the same. These are calculations which can be easily made; we know the amount of cash; we know the quantity of land and its valve; we know what it costs to build those portions to be completed, so that we can consider, with reasonable certainty that we are not going to lose the large amount of money which the hon. members of the Opposition have predicted. Some hon. gentlemen claim that the views of the people have never been expressed upon this method of building the railway. It has been urged that the country has never endorsed this method of building the road. Speaking from my own part of the country that for the last two or three elections, especially after it was announced that the policy of building a through line had been abandoned, and that it had been decided utilize the water stretches, this question was discussed before the electors. We might ask hon. members of this House who contend that the electors have never had a chance of pronouncing upon this question, what was the occasion of the great reversal of opinion that characterized the election of 1878. There is no doubt that the National Policy had a great deal to do with it, but I can assure the hon. gentlemen that in my section of the country the result was influenced by the expenditure that was being carried on by the late Goverment in reference to building the Canadian Pacific Railway. People did not believe that it was in the interest of the country that the railway should be built piecemeal, as the Goverment was then building it. I may ask those hon. gentlemen why, if that question was so forcibly laid upon the electors, did this policy of the water stretches cease to be attractive? We hear nothing of them to day, although there was scarcely a supporter of the old Goverment throughout the country in 1874 who was not prepared to defend that method of building the Canadian Pacific Railway. Moreover, the people became disgusted in reading the developements of waste and extradagance in the Foster contract, the Kaministiquia job, the Fort Francis Locks, when $100,000, $40,000 and $50,000 were devided amongst contractors. The people finally concluded that the water stretches were only a sham. In every instace, when I have been able to take the senses of the people, I have invariably found that it was their desire to have the railway built by a company, and not by the Goverment. The history of the construction of all public works shows that they cost more when constructed by the Goverment than when constructed by private companies. Again the question will suggest itself, what do we gain by giving this contract to a private company? Several calculations have been made with reference to the cost of the Pacific Railway. I find that the average cost of the railway already built in the Dominion by the Goverment is $56,572 per mile. But we are getting the Canadian Pacific Railway built for $28,880, therefore we must save a great deal of money. If this road was built by the Goverment at the average price I have mentioned, it would cost $153,506,400. Taking from that the Goverment grant of land and money, $78,000,000, we find the difference is $74,536,400 which is saved to the country by letting the contract to a private company. In this estimate I value the land at $1 an acre. Here, I may say, that I think the valuation that has been put on that land by hon. gentlemen is entirely erroneous. They quote from returns made with reference to railroads in the United States who have sold the lands after the railway is built, and after the land has been increased in value by the building of the road. Now the Ontario Goverment has found that the price of land is about $1.50 an acre, and that in a province where there are railroads every where. Consequently land in the far west where there are no R.R. within hundreds or thousands of miles, cannot be worth as much as in Ontario. We cannot value the land after the railway is built, becavse land always advances in value. In my section of country the building of a railway has doubled the value of land, and it will be so in the North-West, consequently I say that $1 an acre is a fair value to put on the land of the North West at the present time. The amount of money the Goverment will pay, together with the land at $1 an acre, and the $28,000,000 we will pay for finishing that part of the road to be given to the Company, will in all amount to $78,000,000. Taking this sum from the $152,000,000 that this railway will cost, if it costs as much as Union Pacific Railway, which is to be the standard, you will find that there is a balance, as I said before, of $74,536,400. I say we absolutely gain that sum by giving this sum to a Syndicate. We gain this sum because I claim the Syndicate can never build the road for $78,000,000. The history of the building of railroads in the Dominion of Canada and the United States has told us in the most unmistakable language that it is impossible to build the road for that amount of money, as it is a natural consequence they have to raise the money. Now, where will they get this money? They must bring it from Europe and other countries. Therefore, by giving this work to a private Company, we not only occupy the North-West country with railroads, but we get the benefit of at least $74,536,000 which they will have to bring here and spend in the country. There is another substantial benefit which will accrue to the country by giving this work to a company, and that is with respect to immigration. In looking over the history of railroads, especially in the Western States, where railway companies have received large grants of land, and where these companies have found it to be to their advantage to get their lands settled as rapidly as possible, we find that they have adopted various schemes of immigration, and spent large amounts of money to get people to settle upon their lands and enhance their value, and to give them a return in the produce carried over their roads. It is estimated that these [illegible] have spent about 75 cents an acre [illegible] purposes. On the same calculation, the amount which the company will spend, in order to get [illegible] acres settled will be $18,750,000, and they will virtually aid the Goverment [illegible] in the interest of the country. Last year we spent about [illegible] in immigration and yet we only brought a few people to this country, and when we added to that the sum I have named, hon. gentlemen will see what a substantial benefit will accrue to the country by giving this contract to the Syndicate; without saying anything of the money brought into the country by the immigrants, and the amount they will contribute to the revenue of the country in the shape of Customs duties. It may be asked what are we saving by giving this road to a company? We are not only saving the difference between what this road will cost the country and the average cost of building railroads in the Dominion of Canada—in other words, the difference between $28,888 a mile, the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and $112,113 a mile, the cost of the Union Pacific Railway—but we are saving the amount of money to be turned over by the Company to the immigration system of this country. We have had some little experience of running railroads in Canada, and we may ask if it cost us in one year $716,083 to run the Intercolonial Railway, a road 800 miles long, passing through three settled provinces where there is large trade, what must be the cost of running a road 2,700 miles long, and running for nearly its whole length through a country that is unsettled? Upon the basis of the cost of the Intercolonial, making no allowance for the difference of the countries through which the two railways run, the Pacific Railway would cost us $2,416,767 a year. If we remember that for the next ten years this road must be a non paying road, and take half the cost of running the road, estimated by hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Rose), or $3,000,000 a year, we find that for the ten years before that road will become self supporting, it will cost to run it $30,000,000. If we add to that sum the $18,750,000 given to this country for the encouragement of immigration, it will amount to $48,000,000, nearly equal to the amount of land and money together given by the Government for the building of the road. Many hon. members ask if the company will be likely to build and run the road provided this bargain is ratified. According to the calculation of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), the Company will derive profit of at least $75,000,000 by building the road, and if that is the case I think we shall have little difficulty of persuading the people of this country that the Syndicate will build the road and run it after it is built. The next question asked is, will the company be likely to bild the easier section of the road and then take the profits that accrue from that and leave the rest in the hands of the Goverment. Some hon. gentlemen opposite have, in the same speech, tried to prove that the company would make millions out of the road, and then, in the same speech, that they would only build the easier section and leave the rest in the hands of the Goverment. If I would offer advice to hon. gentlemen opposite, I would advise them to hold one more caucus and agree on some system of argument that would at least have the merit of consistency, and not have one section trying to prove with all the force, energy and eloquence they possess that the country will be ruined by giving this Syndicate the building of the road, and another with equal force, energy and eloquence arguing that they will build only one part and then abandon the rest of the work. I believe the conclusion the people will arrive at will be that their arguments are as equally fallacious and inconsistent on this subject as they have been on other great questions. Again the question arrises: Are we giving too much land to the Company for building the road? Figures have been cited to show the amount is disproportionate to the grants to United States railroads. I fail to see where hon, gentlemen opposite got their figures. On referring to the United States returns, I find that the Union Pacific and Central Pacific got 35,000,000 acres of land. The length of the one road is 1,029 miles, and that of the other 1,122 miles, a total of 2,149 miles, which is not equal to the length of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and runs through a more populated country. Yet those roads get 35,000,000 acres, while ours only get 25,000,000. The Northern Pacific, which was not as hard to construct or as long as ours, got 47,000,000 acres of land grant; the Atlantic and Pacific received 42,000,000 acres; and we find that up to 1878 the United States granted, for the building of railways and canals 224,056,718 acres of land. It is claimed that now a days too much land is given to railway companies. If we look at the unparalleled progress which has characterized the States that have lately come into the Union, these States which only a short time ago were a wilderness, the great advancement in material wealth which they exhibit is the best evidence we can have of the wisdom of the policy proposed, though we give proportionately a much smaller amount than was given by the United States. I believe in 1825, the first R.R. was built in the United States, and at the present there are 96,000 miles of railway there. Do they regret that they have given over 224,000,000 acres of country is the best argument to the contrary. Now we have another proposed Syndicate before this House which has been sprung on us at a very late period, and which appears to have been sprung on us with the object of making some political capital for the next elections. There is evidently no sincerity in the new offer. If we look at the names, we find that the most of those gentlemen have made money in this country, and the fact of men having made money is the best evidence that they are not ready to risk it without considerable enquiry beforehand. Is it to be supposed that men who are thousands of miles apart will agree to come together and amalgamate in a Syndicate to enter into an enterprise that must cost a large outlay? Knowing so little as these men must know about the undertaking, I would like to ask these hon. gentlemen who throw out this Syndicate as a hurt to the country, if one man of the proposed Syndicate has passed over the line of the proposed railway, or gone to the trouble of any calculation as to its cost or as to what return it will give? There is no evidence at all to satisfy and intelligent public that they have given the question the consideration it would naturally demand considering the large investment of the money it would involve. The fact that they have proposed to put up so much money but only after they were sure that their proposition could not be entertained, is the best evidence of their want of sincerity. No company would pretend to put their money in a concern without scrutinising it from every side so that they would see they would get a return for their money. No company would throw up their money hap-hazard and say: we are going to build the railway although we do not know what it will cost, or anything about it. The hon. member for Gloucester has spoken in eulogistic terms of the personnel of this proposed Syndicate; and say they are men whom to know is but to respect—men incapable of doing wrong. If I were in need of a character I would like to have that hon. gentleman as a friend. I think he would be very likely to give me a good one. Considering that we know some of the new Syndicate, and that their action in the past has been so questionable, and that very strong comments respecting one member at least have been made by one of the judges, we may assume that they are men of integrity. When a judge remarked that he could easily believe that a man dipped in a lake would be taken out dry, as to a certain member was not guilty of personal corruption, we must admit that the integrity of some of them is not what it is represented. If we judge those members who we do not know, by those whom we do, We must conclude that they are not the kind of men we should like to see building this road. Again, when we remember that the majority have been defeated in constituencies, it is possible that they are only acting in concert to get up some scheme that they can use when they try again to get elected in the country. I believe the people see through their scheme. As some of the organs of the hon. gentlemen opposite have [illegible] of the great crowds of people brought together to discuss the Government policy, and of their resolutions of censure, correct reports, however, have shown that some of the Opposition meetings have been thoroughly partisan and one-sided in discussion and action. In my constituency during the holidays I found the opinion prevalent among Conservatives, Independents, and able Reformers alike that it was in the interest of the country that the road should be handed over and built by a company. In that section two meetings were held, and it was represented that a requisitition was handed in to the Mayor of Meaford, asking him to call a public meeting to discuss this question. I saw one of those requisitations; it contained the names of six of the most inveterate Girts to be found in the East Riding of Grey. I I could not help suspecting the integrity of men who had spoken of a large requisition and the decision arrived at as an influential expression of public opinion; for they had only, at the first meeting, I am informed, about 50 people present, the speaking was all one sided, and the resolutions previously prepared. On another occasion a meeting was held where the people had had more time. What was the result? The resolutions in favor of the Government policy were carried by over two to one. I believe that if the country registered its verdict the vote would be two to one in favor of the Goverment scheme. For this reason, and holding these views, I believe it my duty to vote against the amendment. I think that the advantage that would accrue to the country from the scheme of the first Syndicate, would be much greater than if the railway were built as a Goverment work. Where, again, would the new Syndicate obtain the capital to build the road? We know they would require $75,000,000 over and above the Goverment grant, even provided they were able sell their lands immediately. Could they go to Europe and raise money? No doubt their names are high sounding in the Dominion, and that they could raise a little money here; but I believe that in Europe their attempt to float the bonds or their own, would prove a sad spectacle to the country, that they would fail. I am couvinced that the connection of the first Syndicate with Germany, France, England, and the United States, is another strong reason why they should get this contract. For years this country has felt a great want in reference to immigration from Germany, which we have never been able to attract, valuable as it would be to us. I am sure that if the scheme is carried out, a system of emigration would be organized that will secure masses of the best emigrants from Germany and France. Not only would the Syndicate be able to raise all the money wanted, but to apply in the working of our road their railway experience gained in the United States. They will use their influence to give this country the benefit of the railroads they own in the States. The argument of hon. gentlemen opposite, that they would make the Canadian Pacific Railway subservient to their road in the Western States, reminds me much of Lord Dundreary's idea of the tail wagging the dog. If men with only 8,000,000 acres will sink their interest in 25,000,000 for the advantage of the 8,000,000, and if men with 2,700 miles of road sacrifice their interest in it for one of 100 miles long, they will act very unreasonably; indeed, all things considered we should be justified in voting down the amendment and carrying as speedily as possible the Goverment scheme. The member for West Middlesex said that if we supported it, on going back to our constituents we should meet with disappointment; but I am sure we should come back, after giving such an account of our stewardship, as strong as we are to-day. Every argument and epithet has been used to make friends of the Goverment believe that its policy is going to ruin the country. We heard the same predictions as to the National Policy, and believe we shall have the same experience in regard to the present policy. Efforts have been made to delude the people, and induce them to believe that they are being robbed for nothing; but they can see through such statements. The member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said that this was the most gigantic railway swindle of the nineteenth century, which makes me think of an anecdote of a celebrated mayor in the Sothern States. It happened to be the custom of that country, if one was telling extravagant stories or attributing extraordinary virtues to some prominent man, to say that he was the greatest man in the county except the mayor. The custom became so prevalent, of thus honoring the mayor, that when it was neglected the offender was fined. A stranger came to that part of the country who did not understand the custom, and while illustrating the importance of a certain individual he said he was the greatest man in Tennessee. A gentlemen present suggested, that he should except the mayor. The stranger replied that he made no exception. The consequence was that he was brought before a magistrate and fined $5; that official reminding him, at the same time, of the custom of making comparisons. The stranger replied: "All I have got to say is that you are the greatest fool in Tennessee except the mayor." When the hon. gentleman said that the contract was the greatest railway swindle in the nineteenth century, I think he should have added except the swindle of the new Syndicate.

IRA H. OAKVILLE, November 16, 1880.

Mr. R. C. Balmer. Dear Sir,—It affords me unqualified pleasure to bear testimony to the benefit I have experienced from using Burdock Blood Bitters. For several years I have suffered from oft-recurring bilious Headaches, Dyspepsia, and complaints peculiar to my sex, which now I am entirely relieved from, if not cured by using only about half a bottle of the Bitters. I beg to return you my sincere thanks for recommending to me such a valuable medicine.

I remain, yours sincerely,

MRS. IRA MULHOLLAND.

DR J. C. AYER & Co., of Lowell, Mass., have favored us with a complete edition of their Almanacs for 1881, neatly bound in one volume. Turning to its contents we find ourselves prepared to discuss the weather with our afternoon callers in English, German, Dutch, Norwegian, Sweedish, French, Spanish, Portuguese, and Bohemian. We have as yet only perused the English version, and to it we are pleased to give our unqualified endorsement. Though Ayer's Almanac has long been recognized as a standard American work, yet it makes its advent each year with all the vigor and freshness of a first appearance, and is received with a hearty welcome by millions, from the rising to the setting sun. We commend it to our readers as a work replete with instructive information.

Fashion Notes.

CURLS are very fashionable.

NEW opera cloaks are of shaded plush.

BUTTON gloves are no longer fashionable.

IT is not the correct thing to wear tight gloves.

CHINA crape scarfs as accessories for ball toilets are in demand.

BUTTONLESS, loose-wristed gloves take the precedence of all others

PUFFS of crimped tarlatan are the proper trimmings for widow's caps.

EASTERN combinations of Oriental colors grow in fashionable favor.

THE hair, in Paris, is dressed less flat and higher than it was last year.

WITH ball coiffures are worn bandeaux of ribbons set with precious stones.

FASHIONABLE young ladies who used to call for 5½ kids now ask for "sixes."

GOLD, silver and jewelled bandeaux are worn around the head for full dress for balls.

WHITE muslin petticoats are the only undergarments that are made fuller than formerly.

NEWLY imported French underwear of all kinds fit the form as close as possible to be comfortable.

THE favorite artificial flowers of the season are Parma violets, roses, chrysanthemums, and pinks,

GLOVES to be fashionable must be loose in the hands and fingers, but actually wrinkled around the wrists.

WHITE flowers have become things of the past on winter bonnets, they are worn to excess on evening toilets.

VOLUMINOUS jabots, mingled with flowers, are worn down the front of dresses for ceremonious occasions.

CLOAKS of satin de Lyon, with shirred yokes, are rapidly coming in vogue. Fur bands and collars are the trimmings.

WHITE Chudda shawls, enriched on the edges with Oriental embroidery illuminated with gold threads, make the most elegant ball and opera wraps.

UNDRESSED kid gloves, without buttons, light colors, very loose in the hands, and wrinkled around the wrists, take precedence of all others for evening wear.

THE large straight cloaks, with shirred yokes, which are coming in, have elbow sleeves formed of the fulness of the garment and bordered with deep fur bands.

BERTHAS or rivieres of artificial flowers are made to fit the necks of dresses, no matter what the shape may be, and are finished on the shoulders with bouquets or epaulettes of flowers.

YOUNG widows wear Fanchon or bebe caps of tarlatan, with or without strings fastening under the chignon; elderly widows wear large mob caps of the same material, with black net linings on the crowns.

Waifs.

TENNYSON TO MAUD.

Come into the garden mud,
 My darling, my life, my own;
Come with a jump and a thud,
 Ere the black bat night is flown.

For the mud of the garden is pure,
 But the mud of the street is vile,
And our footing will be more sure,
 So we'll wade in the former awhile.

JOHN calls his wife's hair-dresser her switch tender.

"THOUGH he sleigh me yet will I trust in him," says the pious maiden of her lover.

SHORT courtship: "Rachel the Lord hath sent me to marry thee," said the suitor. "The Lord's will be done," was the submissive reply.

"YOU seem to enjoy telling fibs," dryly remarked an old lady to her little niece the other day. "Yes, auntie," replied the child. "I think I do, but I enjoy having you swallow them more."

THE fashionable spring bonnet for 1881 is to be profusedly decorated with flowers, and provided in the rear with a fire-escape, so that the wearer's friends can climb to the top and see the trimmings.

"I SWEAR," said a gentleman to his lady love, "you are very handsome." "Pooh," said the lady, "so you would say if you did not think so." "And so you would think," answered he, "though I should not say so."

A TROY girl who has been deaf since childhood regained her hearing through the mediumship of a handsome young doctor who tackled her case. He sat down beside her and began telling her how good-looking she was.

A STORY is told of a North Adams young man who called on a young lady for the first time Sunday evening. After an hour or two of pleasant conversation on various subjects, the "man of the house" entered the room were the young people were sitting. He was introduced to the young man, and, after a few remarks upon the weather, etc., left the room and retired for the night. Nine o'clock came, and the caller, saying "Good Night," left for his home. The next morning, on passing the house, the young man had occasion to speak with the young lady, and when about to resume his down town journey, met "the man of the house" coming in the gate. "Well, young man, you hold on pretty long," said the old gentleman, and the poor young mam, without stopping to explain, went his way, puzzled whether to commit suicide or go a-fishing.

THE old Duchess of Somerset, the sale of whose effects took place the other day, had a passion for dress which lasted to the very end of her life, and as she held to the opinion that nothing is too good to wear and nothing is too bad to keep, cupboards and drawers were filled to overflowing, and the whole attic story of her house in Park street completely stuffed with dresses. The coronation robes worn at the crowning of Queen Victoria were there, of crimson velvet, lined with miniver. Her Grace was wont to have this robe brought to her once in three months, when she would try it on and parade before the looking glass with as much delight at her appearance as she must have felt on the occasion on which it was first donned. The Duke's coronet was there of silver, mounted in gold lace and trimmed with miniver, and his garter robes shone forth in splendor, and then came the relic of the sentiment which belongs to all alike—the Duke's wedding vest, of white satin, embroidered in silver, and kept by the wife with the same care and reverence as Marlborough treasured the lock of Sarah's hair—after so many years as bright and fresh as ever. The sale has made a great impression in London and called up stories of the dead and gone.

An Accommodating Parson.

Recently in Texas a couple bent on marriage procured a license, and set out with one or two friends to look up a parson. They reached the river, but alas! the would be bride could not cross. The only parson for long, weary miles was just across the river, while visions of irate parents with double-barreled shot guns formed a very long and troublesome procession through the minds of the two lovers. The weather was cold, the river was up, and what could they do? One of the escort suggested that he would swim the river and see, if possible, the parson, who, undoubtedly, would fix up a plan to tie the nuptial knot. He did so, found the preacher, and soon had him down on the river bank. The water was cold and deep, and he refused point black to cross over, to the very great distress of the young couple on the other side. Necessity is not only the mother of inventions, but the mother of expedients. The parson concluded to marry the couple across the river, and they joined hands and took their stand near the water's edge, while the preacher, on the opposite bank, in stentorian voice pronounced the marriage service, and declared them man and wife.

Women's Names.

Annabella is not Anna-bella, or Fair Anna, but is the feminine of Hannibal, meaning gift (or grace) of Bel. Arabella is not Ara-bella, or beautiful altar, but Orabilis, a praying woman. In its Anglicised form of Orabel, it was very much more common in the thirteenth century than at present. Maurice has nothing to do with Mauritius, or a Moor, but comes from amalric—himmelrich—the kingdom of heaven. Ellen is the feminine of Alain, Alan, or Allen, and has no possible connection with Helen, which comes from a different language and is older by about a thousand years at least. Amy is not from aimee, but from amier. Avice, or Avis, does not exactly mean advice, as some seem to think. It comes from Æd-wis, and means happy wisdom. Eliza has no connection with Elizabeth. It is the sister of Louisa, and both are the daughters of Heloise, which is Helewis, hidden wisdom. There is, indeed, another form of Louisa, or rather Louise, which is the feminine of Louis, but was scarcely heard of before the sixteenth century. The older Heloise form of the name Aloisa, Aloisia, or Aloysia, was adopted into mediæval English, as Alesia,—a name which our old genealogists always confuse with Alice. Emily and Amelia are different forms of one name. Emily is from Æmylia, the name of an Etruscan gem. Amelia comes from the Gothic amala—heavenly. Reginald is not derived from Regnia, and has nothing to do with a queen. It is Rein-alt—exalted purity. Adelais, Adelaide, Alisa, Alix, Adeline, are all forms of one name, the root of which is adel—noble. But Anne was never used as identical with Annis, or Agnes (of which last the old Scotch Annas is a variety), nor, as I sturdily maintain, was Elizabeth ever synonymous with Isabel.

Marriage in Cuba.

A correspondent at Havana sends the following to an exchange: Readers who have or have not been wooed and won, even in spite of the difficulties that often attend that exciting period of the lives of young men and women in this country, will thank fortune that nothing more than an irate father or meddlesome mother or an empty pocket-book stood in the way of matrimonial bliss. During dinner one day I was observing, while talking, a scene that was taking place near the gates of an opposite house, and I will describe it, as it illustrates well the habits of the people in love affairs. A well-dressed young man was speaking from the outside with a pretty young lady who was standing at one of the corners of the window. The lover was in such a position that the persons who were in the parlor of the young lady's house could not see him. Sometimes it happened that one of them approached the window; she then gave notice to the young man, and he would immediately start and stop at the corner of the block and stay there watching. As soon as the risk was over he would come slowly to his post, in order to continue his interrupted conversation. What a troublesome way of courting a lady! The notice I gave to the others of what was going on afforded me much information as to the method of courtship. Sometimes this sort of thing is going on at each window of the one-story houses, and not unfrequently two in each may be seen. This generally occurs when the suitor is not admitted to the house on account of not having an introduction or when the parents of the girl disapprove the acquaintance of their daughter with the suitor. The method however, is generally condemned and avoided even by the young men, who fear to depreciate the character of the the object of their affections. If they cannot visit them they take advantage of all opportunities of seeing them in public places, at a church or theatre or possibly at the house of a common friend. The chief resource used is a correspondence, in which the servants, and sometimes the friends of the young lady, act as mediators. Some of these love letters are very funny; The love-stricken heroes put the powers of the pen to the utmost; they exhaust their erudition and indulge in hyperboles, metaphors, and smiles to an alarming extent, in order to show the vehemence of their passion and make the most impossible promises. The following is copy of one written, evidently by a student, which strikes one as an amusing burlesque, but which undoubtedly was intended to express a great deal:

"MISS: Your beautiful image had scarcely struck the retina of my eye, by means of a convergent ray, when my cave vena was filled with hot blood, as if I had tasted the nectar of the gods or the heavenly ambrosia," etc.

Endearments of this kind are frequent and are often kept up for years, and even then do not end in marriage. It is not uncommon for the lover to disappoint his enamorado under frivolous pretexts, on account of natural inconstancy or for a more golden prospect, for the wealth of the young lady is the leading requisite. It is said, in justice to the fair sex, that they are very seldom inconstant, scarcely ever dismissing a lover except for very powerful reasons. Cubans generally marry rather late in life—the men when about thirty and the women when about twenty-five. This is rather singular, considering the influence of the climate. The reason for it is a hard one to find, and no satisfactory one has ever been given. It is rather singular that one of the rules respecting marriage is the same in Cuba as in many parts of the United States, particularly in New York. The bridegroom and bride start from the church where the ceremony is performed on a trip into the country, where they stay for a week or two. Then they return to the city and give notice of the marriage to their friends, who immediately go to greet them. The greatest possible secrecy, is, however, observed in the performance of the ceremony, which takes place at the time the churches are empty or leave is obtained from the bishop to be married at the lady's residence. The laws of the church forbid marriages with persons of different religious beliefs or among near relatives. The latter prohibition is, however, easily surmounted by paying the bishop a sum, the amount of which increases in proportion to the intimacy of the kindred. For legitimate marriages the consent of the fathers is necessary; if these be dead, that of the mothers must be secured. Lastly, that of the paternal or maternal grandfather, of the tutor, and in default of those persons, of the judge, provided the age of the individuals to be married be over a certain limit, will be sufficient. Clergymen and nuns are not allowed to marry, but widowers, even with children, are allowed to become clergymen.

A Paris Elopement.

There has just been an instance of French credulity and snobbishness in the Faubourgh St. Honore, says a Paris letter, which shows that snobs and fools may be found even among the natives—the autochtones, as M. Gustave Flaubert, would have termed them. Prince X.—I call him X., for his real name is yet an unknown quantity, in spite of the efforts of M. Andreieux's agents to discover his identity—Prince X. came, saw, and was admitted to several circles in the vicinity of the Palace de l'Opera. He played high, lost, and paid without hesitation; was never caught with, or even suspected of having, an extra pack of cards up his sleeve, and, finally, was invited to one of the most fashionable houses in the Roule quarter. Here he met Mlle. Y., a beauty and an heiress, who was charmed with the prince and his title, and, with the consent of her parents, engaged herself to marry him. So far everything was gay and festive; the trousseau was ordered, the date for the signature of the contract was fixed, when, just as the invitations were about to be issued, the future father-in-law received and communicated to his future son-in-law a number of letters, not anonymous, whence it appears that X. is not a prince; that he is a penniless chevalier d'industrie, and that he had been forced the leave the country of his birth for that country's good. Great was the indignation of the noble stranger, who only asked for eight-and-forty hours' time, at the end of which he would "confound his calumniators and unmask their machinations." M. Y. was only too willing to be persuaded that the suitor of his child is the real Simon Pure. He granted the request; but instead of interdicting to him all visits until the mystery should be cleared up, he authorized their continuance. Epilogue: Last Tuesday the prince and his young woman eloped, fleeing away by night to some other clime, and paterfamiliar is left unconsolable. He is a former financial functionary, immensely rich, who owns one of the most sumptuous chateaus in France, a few miles only distant from the capital, and he asks himself whether, as his heiress is self-willed and obstinate, he might not have been wiser in his generation if he had held his tongue and paid the prince's debts, instead of setting the police to discover the truth of the accusation that the Wallachian is only a discharged servant of a Boyard who resides in one of the Danubian principalities.

"MAMMA, I don't think the people who make dolls are very pious people," said a little girl to her mother one day. "Why not, my child?" "Because you can never make them kneel. I always have to lay my doll down on her stomach to say her prayers."

History of the Horse.

HOW THE HORSE ILLUSTRATES THE LAW OF DEVELOPMENT—IMPORTANT RESULTS OF PROF. MARSH'S LABORS.

(London Times.)

At the meeting of the Zoological society last week, among the papers read was one by Prof. Huxley on the application of the laws of evolution to the arrangement of the vertebrata, and more particularly mammalia. The illustrations adduced were those of the history of the horse, principally, so far as is known, from the work of Prof. Marsh on the "Eocenes of North America." The announcement of the paper had drawn together an unusually large attendance, as it was expected that the marshaling of the facts in Prof. Huxley's hands would have great interest in practically substantiating the theory of evolution, which, though foreshadowed by others, took practical shape in the work of Darwin twenty-one years ago. Prof. Huxley said: There is evidence, the value of which has not been disputed, and which in my judgment amounts to proof, that between the commencement of the tertiary epoch and the present time the group of the equidæ has been represented by a series of forms, of which the oldest is that which departs least from the general type of structure of the higher mammalia, while the latest is that which most widely differs from that type. In fact, the earliest known equine animal possesses four complete sub-equal digits on the fore foot, three on the hind foot; the ulna is complete and distinct from the radius; the fibula is complete and distinct from the tibia; there are forty-four teeth, the full number of canines being present, and the cheek-teeth having short crowns with simple patterns and early-formed roots. The latest, on the other hand, has only one complete digit on each foot, the rest being represented by rudiments; the ulna is reduced and partially encylosed with the radius; the fibula is still more reduced and partially encylosed with the tibia; the canine teeth are partially or completely suppressed in the females; the first cheek-teeth usually remain undeveloped, and when they appear are very small; the other cheek-teeth have long crowns, with highly complicated patterns and late-formed roots. The equidæ of intermediate ages exhibit intermediate characters. With respect to the interpretation of these facts two hypotheses, and only two, appear to be imaginable. The one assumes that these successive forms of equine animals have come into existence independently ot one another. The other assumes that they are the result of the gradual modification undergone by the successive members of a continuous line of ancestry. As I am not aware that any zoologist maintains the first hypotheses, I do not feel called upon to discuss it. The adoption of the second, however, is equivalent to the acceptance of the doctrine of evolution so far as horses are concerned, and in the absence of evidence to the contrary, I shall suppose that it is accepted. Since the commencement of the eocene epoch, the animals which constitute the family of the equidæ have undergone processes of modification of three kinds: 1. There has been an excess of development of one part of the oldest form over another; 2. Certain parts have undergone complete or partial suppression; 3. Parts originally distinct have coalesced. Employing the term "law" simply in the sense of a general statement of facts ascertained by observation, I shall speak of these three processes by which the eohippus form has passed into equus, as the expression of a three-fold law of evolution. It is of profound interest to remark that this law, or generalized statement of the nature of the ancestral evolution of the horse, is precisely the same as that which formulates the process of individual development in animals generally, from the period at which the broad characters of the group to which an animal belongs are discernible onward. After a mammalian embryo, for example, has taken on its general mammalian characters, its further progress toward its special form is affected by the excessive growth of one part or relation to another, by the arrest or suppression of parts already formed, and by the coalescence of parts primarily distinct. This coincidence of the laws of ancestral and individual development creates a strong confidence in the general validity of the former, and a belief that we may safely employ it in reasoning deductively from the known to the unknown. The astronomer who has determined three places of a new planet calculates its place at an epoch, however remote; and, if the law of evolution is to be depended upon, the zoologist who knows a certain length of the course of that evolution in any given case may with equal justice reason backward to the earlier but unknown stages. Applying this method to the case of the horse, I do not see that there is any reason to doubt that the eocene equidæ were preceded by metozoic forms, which differed from eohippus in the same way as eohippus differs from equus. And thus we are ultimately led conceive of a first form of the equine series, which, if the law is of general validity, must need have been provided with five sub-equal digits on each plantigrade foot, with complete, sub-equal antebrachial and crural bones, with clavicles, and with, as at present, fourty-four teeth, the cheek-teeth having short crowns and simple-ridged or tuberculated patterns. Moreover, since Marsh's investigations have shown that the older forms of any given mammalian group have less developed cerebral hemispheres than the later, there is a prima facie probability that this primordial hippoid had a low form of brain. Further, since the existing horse has a diffuse allantoic placentation, the primary form could not have presented a higher, and may have possessed a lower, condition of the various modes by which the fetus derives nourishment from the parent. Such an animal as this, however, would find no place in any of our systems of classification of the mammalia. It would come nearest to the lemuroidea and the insectivora, though the non-prehensile pes would separate it from the former and the placentation from the latter group. A natural classification is one which associates together all those forms which are closely allied and separates them from the rest. But, whether in the ordinary sense of the word "alliance" or in its purely morphological sense, it is impossible to imagine a group of animals more closely allied than our primordial hippoids are with their descendants. Yet, according to existing arrangements, the ancestors would have to be placed in one order of the class of mammalia and their descendants in another. It may be suggested that it might be as well to wait until the primordial hippoid is discovered before discussing the difficulties which will be created by its appearance. But the truth is that that problem is already pressing in another shape. Numerous "lemurs," with marked ungulate characters, are being discovered in the older territories of the United States and elsewhere; and no one can study the more ancient mammals with which we are already acquainted without being constantly struck with the insectivorous characters which they present. In fact, there is nothing in the detention of either primates, carnivores, or ungulates, which is any means of deciding whether a given fossil skeleton, with skull, teeth, and limbs, almost complete, ought to be ranged with the lemurs, the insectivores, the carnivores, or the ungulates. In whatever order of mammals a sufficiently long series of forms has come to light, they illustrate the three-fold law of evolution as clearly, though, perhaps, not so strikingly, as the equine series does. Carnivores, artiodactyles, and periosodactyles all tend, as we trace them back through the tertiary epoch, toward less modified forms, which will fit into none of the recognized orders, but come closer to the insectivora than to any other. It would, however, be most inconvenient and misleading to term these primordial forms insectivora, the mammals so called being themselves more or less specialized modifications of the same common type, and only, in a partial and limited sense, representatives of that type. The root of the matter appears to me to be that the paleontogical facts which have come to light in the course of the last ten or fifteen years have completely broken down existing taxonomical conceptions, and that the attempts to construct fresh classifications, upon the old model are necessarily futile. The Cuvieran method, which all modern classifiers have followed, has been of immense value to leading to the close investigation and the clear statement of the anatomical character of animals. But its principle, the association into sharp logical categories defined by such characters, was sapped when Van Baer showed, in estimating the likeness and unlikeness of animals, development must be fully taken into account, and if the importance of individual development necessarily follows. If the end of all zoological classification is a clear and concise expression of the morphological resemblances and differences of animals, then all such resemblances must have a taxonomic value. But they fall under three heads: First, those of adult individuals; second, those of successive stages of embryological development or individual evolution; third, those of [illegible] of the evolution of the species or ancestral evolution. An arrangement is "natural," that is, logically justifiable, exactly in so far as it expresses the relations of likenesses and [illegible] their adult and embryogenetic characters, but their morphological relations, in so far as the several forms represent [illegible] of evolution. [illegible] school to the [illegible] of Linne's teachings (imperfect and objectionable as these often were in their accidents) turns out to have been a reactionary mistake, so Cuvier's no less definite repudiation of Bonnet's echelle at the present day, the existence of a scala animantium, is necessary consequence of the doctrine of evolution, and its establishment constitutes, I believe, the foundation of scientific taxonomy. Many years ago, in my lectures at the royal college of surgeons I particularly insisted on the central position of the insectivora among the higher mammalia; and further study of this order and of the rodentia has only strengthened my conviction that any one who is acquainted with the range of variation of structure in these groups possesses the key to every peculiarity which is met with in the primates, the carnivora, and the ungulata. Given the common plan of the insectivora and of the rodentia, and granting that the modifications of the structure of the limbs, of the brain, and of the alimentary and reproductive viscera which occur among them may exist and accumulate elsewhere, and the deviation of all eutheria from animals which, except for their diffuse placentation, would be insectivores, is a simple deduction from the law of evolution. I venture to express a confident expectation that investigation into the mammalia fauna of the mesozoic epoch will, sooner or latter, fill up these blanks. Prof. Huxley proceeded to give details on which his conclusions were based, and dwelt on the fact that much further careful work is needed to clear up problems before us.

Wages and Cost of Living in China

[From the San Francisco Bulletin.]

There have been many books written on China, from the time of Abbe Huc to the present. But most of them have been too general to present any precise idea of the actual social conditions in that vast empire. Recent official observation has, however, done much to clear away the mists which obscure real life. Most of the trades which we have are carried on in the Central Flowery land. There are there the traditional "butcher, baker, and candle-stick maker." But there is a peculiarity which is not found in civilization. The artist obtains no higher rewards than the ordinary craftsman. There appears to be a dead level for all who work with hand or finger. A master workman in any of the trades in China gets $3 per week, or $156 per annum. But the workmen only get half that remuneration; $1.50 per week, or $78 per annum, is the average rate, and it is not every workman who can obtain it. Youngsters or women get 50 cents per week, or $26 per annum, It will be observed that these are the wages paid in the higher walks of art and mechanics. There is only one class of operatives who are more handsomely rewarded. Gold and silversmiths do a little better. The silk reeler or spinner sometimes gets from $1 to $2 per day, because the silk has to be reeled off the cocoons in a given time, and, as a consequence, the work has to be prosecuted day and night. Consul Denny, at Shanghai, thus figures out the expenses, per annum, of living in connection with the compensation specified:

For a Master.

For food, &c.	$72
For rent, &c.	36
For clothing	12
Total	$120

For a Workman.

For food, &c.	$45
For rent	12
For clothing	8
Total	$65

The same authority adds: "The master generally lives at the workshop, where he has, perhaps, two rooms, besides a place to cook in. The household furniture may be estimated at from $20 to $30. The ordinary workman, if married, will share a small house with a friend, and occupy one room, and have access to the kitchen. He may live with his parents, in which case his earnings go to the common fund. Under such circumstances, $10 to $15 will cover the value of the household furniture." We have no form of Chinese life in California, except in very rare cases, which corresponds to that which is here portrayed. There are only a few Chinese families in this city. Nearly all the Chinese are male adults without any family ties or connexions, at least in this country. But we get a glimpse of that peculiar state of things in China also. Consul Denny further says that if the Chinamaman is "a bachelor, and away from his family, he will either sleep at his employer's for a consideration, or stay with a friend; in either case his whole inventory consists of a box with his clothes, and his bedding." This is a complete portrait of the Chinaman in California. He is got up in light marching order.

But the common labourer, whether in field or kitchen, does not get anything like the wages of the skilled artisan. The farm labourer, during harvest time, gets, besides his meals—worth about 10 cents—from 10 cents to fifteen cents a day, or from 70 cents to $1.05 a week. He can be hired by the month for from $1.50 to $2. If he gets permanent employment he is willing to accept $12 per annum, with board and lodging. If he works for shorter terms, 50 cents a month will suffice for house rent, and $2 per annum will keep his wardrobe in repair. But there is a grade below these free labourers known as coolies, who are often glad to work for five cents a day.

Kissing and Telling It.

When the wrong man kisses the right woman or the right man kisses the wrong woman—and both sometimes happen—it does not always follow that there is a disturbance about it. The world can never know, how much unauthorized kissing has been done and forgiven and forgotten. In the naturally wild and audacious career of the human kind there is a good deal of that sort of business, and it is just as well that it is not openly dragged before the public on every occasion. If that were always done it would be very discouraging to a reasonable delightful pastime which more or less concerns everybody. Many of the cares and trials of this world find relief in a kiss; it is a very little thing, uncommonly sweet for its size, and one of the few luxuries of this world which well-organized people neverget too much of. Nobody who understand even the rudiments of kissing disdain its practice, and those who have been so fortunate as to reach something of the science of the thing are not easily restrained in their pursuit of supreme happiness. A kiss doesn't cost anything, and it's a pretty small matter to make a disturbance about, and most people will endure a good deal of kissing without getting angry about it and regarding it as a misfortune to make public complaint. Now and then, however, human nature is put to an awful test in this way, and human nature breaks down. A man may not be so particular about putting his kisses where they will do the most good; the chief aim of man is to get the kiss, and he is frequently too hasty and too reckless about it. But a woman is apt to be a little more considerate in her preferences.

There was an Illinois woman, now, who had a prejudice against being kissed by a tailor (possibly because the other eight parts of the man were not around), although the tailor was perfectly free to say that he had no prejudice against kissing the lady. He regarded her as sweet enough to kiss, and frankly told her so. There are some cold, proud women who, in some unaccountable way, have got into this world, who would not be affected by any such talk, but the number of these is very, very few. Whether the Illinois would was one of this rare kind or not is still a matter of dispute. It is also undecided whether she kissed the tailor he was a handsome man; she insists that, being a truthful woman, she could not have done so conscientiously, while he takes the opposite side of the question. There is, however, no controversy about the one point that he did kiss her, and that is the most important thing. It is not certain just what was the matter with this kiss—whether it was not up to the standard, or whether there may not be something peculiar about a tailor's kiss. But it is certain that the lady didn't lose much time in telling her husband about it, and the husband lost no time in horse-whipping the tailor for doing just what he had doubtless himself done a thousand times. In this way the matter became the property of the public, for the tailor proceeded against the husband for assault. Perhaps when the case is brought to trial we shall get some idea about what there is to a tailor's kiss which induces a woman to tell her husband about it and create a disturbance in the community. Such a course is as strange as it is unusual, and if allowed to go on unrebuked must inevitably cut tailors off from many of the good things of this world.

ROMANTIC HISTORY OF THE FIRST SWORDSMAN OF EUROPE.

(Paris Figaro.)

Any person who has frequented the public promenades of Florence may have occasionally met a little man, about 40 years old, of very elegant figure, well knit, firmly braced upon his legs, walking before him, with the air rather of preoccupation rather than revery. But what would especially notice about this personage is that as he walks along he never ceases to execute fencing manœuvres with his arms, variations of lunge or combinations of guard. Any one can tell you his name. It is San Malato.

As I have said, he is of no small stature, but has a finely arched foot, the sign of his race; his hand is very delicate, but strong; the sword-hilt sits firmly in it. Chestnut moustaches and hair; he is not of the swarthy Italian type. His face is full of energy, with its strongly cut features; and nevertheless there is much gentleness in that physiognomy. His whole figure compels the idea of a man powerfully muscled.

Ten years ago no one would have believed that the Baron di San Malato would ever open a fencing school. A Sicilian gentleman, he lived magnificently in Sicily. He drew upon his fortune with both hands, flinging his gold out of the windows with reckless generosity, as one loves to see great gentlemen do. His luxury had rendered him famous; his prodigality made him popular.

There was no fantasy worthy of a great lord by which he was not tempted; and none which he did not obey. Never was the man's caprice better served than by this man. He loved luxury with a luxurious love. His stables were kept like a palace; his palace like a museum. People came to see his ten splendid horses pawing marble, eating out of silver, drinking out of crystal; just as they would also visit his galleries to admire his works of art. "Le vin, le jeu les femmes," he seldom went beyond the range of that romance, and he sang it enchantingly well. He kept at once the best table, the greatest buncos, and the finest mistresses.

He played "Mæcenas" after a fashion of his own; delighting to protect music in the persons of divas, and dancing in those of the greatest choregraphic stars. Once his fancy had been taken by a roulade or a jete-battu,—a nightingale throat or the shapely limbs of a sylph, it was no use for the public to refuse to adopt the favourite. This sultan hired the theatre for himself, paid for all the seats, flung open all the doors, and said, "Enter!" A magnificent method of assuring success, surely, pitiful little protectors that we are, who vaunt of having distributed five louis to the claque!

But the feast could not endure forever at this rate. One fine morning San Malato, having by chance looked into his strong box, found it absolutely empty. Like all thorough-bred bons viveurs he did not long hesitate what to do. Nevertheless, fancy that his eyes must have become dimmed for a moment—that moment of brief farewell that we give to the irreparable past, when we are men of nerve. He looked into the future as one looks into a river upon a cold day before plunging in. He did not first put in one foot and then then the other, crying: "Aie! ca pince!"—he simply crossed himself and dived in head foremost. This was how the Baron di San Malato became a fencing-master.

To begin with, he was already a splendid fencer, one of the best. Fencing had always been a favourite diversion with him, as all manly sports are to finely-tempered natures. Taught by his father, a consummate swordsman, whom our fathers in the art of using the foils may remember to have seen at Paris, he devoted five years more to the severest study, the most carefully supervised courses of instruction. And when he opened his school at Florence, it was not only the first swordsman in Italy whom the aristocracy came to salute:—it was perhaps still more the modest pride and glorious courage of their former comrade. You can well imagine that under such conditions the fencing-hall of Via Mezza became the rendezvous of high Florentine society. For five months during his stay there, the Prince Imperial was one of the most assiduous pupils who honourod the school, together with members of the oldest nobility and the most brilliant men of elegant society. This fact speaks for itself—160 francs ror a trial of skill with the master; 50 francs for a lesson. They do things on a grand scale in Florence!

As to the romantic side of the man—or, rather the picturesque—one could never do justice to it. In the first place, it should be stated that San Malato is known throughout the peninsula, and is known in the peliar light of a legendary type. He has often been called the D'Artagnan of Italy; and certainly with good reason. Wherever there has been a noble cause to maintain, a threatening danger; wherever there was a man unjustly suffering, a woman weeping, a child crying for aid; above all, wherever and whenever the fatherland beckoned, he wasthere, San Malato! Twenty-two wounds received upon the field of battle! One of the first among those hundred and fifty soldiers of epic celebrity who, at Aspremont, held their own against seventeen thousand men! Forty duels for matters of honour! Mon Dieu, yes!—but I am sure that out of them all he did not provoke three.

Most of them occurred in Sicily. Here is one which seems to me worthy of attention. It was upon the public square of Palermo. I forget what was the political ardor which fired the fiery dispositions of the people at the time. I think it was about a candidacy. Under the blue sky they were chatting and arguing. The Chevalier de P—, a cousin of the candidate in question, spoke of his relative in terms worse than disrespectful.

"You are a coward!" said San Malato.

How comical the sequel was.

"Will you dare to repeat that in five minutes?" retorted the chevalier.

"Most assuredly," replied San Malato.

Thereupon the Chevrlier de P—— entered his residence, which faced the square. Five minutes afterward he came out and entered the group, with a revolver in his hand. San Malato went to meet him.

"Let me first make another remark: a revolver does not become your hands; it is not a weapon fit for such as you; you do not know how to use it."

And he spat in his face. Astonishment on the part of the chevalier, who remained motionless, as if rooted to the ground, his arms hanging by his side as if paralyzed. San Malato spat in his face a second time. Friends intervened and separated them. Then, of course, seconds were chosen. Swords were selected. In the evening San Malato was visited by Mme. de P——, mother of the chevalier. She knew his terrible strength and skill; she came to beg him not to kill her son.

"It shall be as you wish, madame; you may rely upon my word."

Next morning San Malato, at the moment of leaving his house, gave a letter to one of his seconds, and requested him to convey it at once to Mme. de P——. Then he went on the ground, and both men took their positions.

The chevalier attacked him furiously. San Malato parried without lunging. Three times the attack was made without any difference in the character of the contrast; the one adversary vigorous and eager, the other supremely indifferent. A witness bent forward and whispered something in the ear of the chevalier.

"Yes, it is true," said San Malato, "I do not wish to touch you. Let us continue!"

And this time the diabolical man continued the combat with his face turned toward the seconds. These finally put an end to the fantastic encounter.

"Then San Malato said to de P——:

"Go and see madame your mother. She will explain what you do not understand!"

Let us tell another story of him while we are at it—the story of another duel, but a different kind. They were fighting with sabres; the adversary was the Count De B——, the most remarkable sabreur of that time. San Malato was much less skilful. He took his weapon in both hands and charged furiously upon De B——, who retired, defending himself. They were called back to their positions. De B—— was disarmed. A third time the encounter commenced, and San Malato's sabre broke off about thirty centimetres from the hilt. Nevertheless B—— continued the fight, and the seconds allowed him to do it. Then San Malato became furious. He flung himself forward, wounded the Count De B—— desperately with the stump of his weapon, and, as a lesson, gave a severe slash to all the seconds, commencing with his own.

Nearly all of his duels have had a political origin, so that he hates politics, and anyone who talks politics before him becomes his enemy. He has three affections—three things which he adores—God, his mother, and his son. Is not this truly worthy of D'Artagnan? I need not speak of his profession, which he loves passionately. The love which swordsmen have for their swords has long been proverbial. When he speaks of it, the tenderness of his speech borrows a greater charm from the sweetness of his native language—[illegible] combination of [illegible] and [illegible] for an Italian nature.

His mission in Italy [illegible] to be the development of peculiar ideas upon the field of honor. According to him the really brave man feels his moral and physical strength doubled when he has thrown off his coat, and he assures us that he never managed his weapon more skilfully than in a duel.

To observe those muscles of steel, that sinewy suppleness, one cannot help anticipating panther-leaps and terrible surprises. But the real danger does not lie there; and it is not possible with such a man to seek points de repere from the lesson of preceding encounters. Sometimes, like a veteran swordsman, he relies wholly upon science, and leaves nothing to chance; sometimes, with the fire of a youth of 18, he gives free rein to all the resources of the most vivid imagination. He has studied the methods of all schools, and appears to have arrived at perfection in each. In fine, we shall soon see that for ourselves; for we are not all like the Sicilian brigands.

One day, when San Malato was riding in his carriage, a band of bandits appeared upon the road. They stopped the vehicle and throttled the coachman. Then the chief of the band put his head and his blunderbuss in at the window and cried in his cavernous voice:

"Get out, all of you!"

San Malato, always leaning upon his elbow in a languorous mood, exclaimed in a voice of exquisite hauteur:

"Spread your cloaks upon the ground; I might soil my feet getting down."

"San Malato! San Malato!" yelled the brigands; and they fled in terror.

I may appear to be relating a fiction; but this is historical truth; all the Italian papers mentioned it. But I only wanted to point out a difference. We cry, "San Malato! San Malato!" but far from flying, we shall all rush to meet him. En gard maintenant!

POPULAR SCIENCE.

MR. C. J. KINTNER, of the United States patent-office, believes that, judging from what has already been done in various applications of electricity, within the next decade we shall find our large telegraphic corporations operating their elevators, supplying motive power, heat, and light throughout their buildings, and electricity for their lines, from one common source of power.

A PHOTOGRAPHIC sunshine recorder has been invented by Capt. Abney. It consists of a semi-cylindrical box, with a flat lid, in the centre of which is a small hole. Round the inside of the cylinder strips of sensitive paper are fixed, and the instrument is then so placed that the sun, the hole, and the centre line of the paper are in the same plane. As the sun moves, therefore, its track will be recorded on the paper.

MR. A. H. KEANE says that the extremely low estimate of the Australian intellect formed by Mr. Wake and other ethnologists seems at least somewhat premature, and that no one can turn over the pages of Brough Smith's great work on the aborigines of Victoria without coming to the conclusion that the race has been much vilified and unduly depreciated by careless or superficial observers. Many instances are given of their skill in drawing, a capacity for which was wholly denied them. Their children constantly show themselve "quite as capable of receiving and profiting by instruction as the children of untaught parents among the white race."

IT appears from one of the recently published memoirs of the science department of the University of Tokio that there is nothing to warrant the belief entertained some years ago regarding the enormous quantities of gold and copper to be found in Japan. Whatever rich and easily-worked deposits of either metal may have existed there, they were long since exhausted. Any remunerative extraction of gold or copper must now be pursued according to scientific methods and by persons possessing capital. Coal is just now the most profitable mineral brought to the surface in Japan. There are annually exported 160,000,000 catties (a catty is about 1⅓ pounds), but the coal imported is yet about 47,396,000 catties. Copper ranks second, silver third, and gold fourth in the mineral wealth of Japan.

A SIMPLE magic lantern, from the construction and use of which a good deal of instruction and amusement may be derived during winter evenings, is described in The Scientific American. A small box, a kerosene lamp with an argand burner, a little fish-globe filled with pure water, and a common double or piano convex lens are all the materials necessary to make it. A hole is bored in the top of the box to permit the chimney of the lamp to pass through and allow the heat and the products of combustion to escape. In the side of the box a round hole is cut large enough to admit a portion of the globe, which is suspended inside the box close to the lamp. A piece of common glass is then moistened with a strong solution of sulphate of soda, and placed on a stand or clip so that the light from the lamp will be focused on it by the globe. The image of the glass will thus be thrown upon a screen when the lens is properly adjusted. The formation of the crystals of the sulphate of soda will be seen clearly on the screen, and appear like the magical growth of a forest. Any ingenious family can readily devise a great number of interesting experiments with this inexpensive lantern.

Carlyle's Visitor.

One of the most constant visitors at Carlyle's house in Cheyne Walk, is a lady, whose friendship with the philosopher began in a curious manner. Many years ago, the Rev. Dr. Thomas, now of Chapham road chapel, delivered a lecture in Stockwell on Carlyle's works. Among his audience was a young girl in humble circumstances, upon whose mind the glowing eulogies of the great master's writings made a vivid impression. Returning home she managed to became the possessor of one of Carlyle's volumes, which she read with avidity; and then, yielding to an uncontrolable impulse, she penned a letter to the author expressing her gratitude for the light which his work had been the means of throwing upon many subjects that had hitherto perplexed her. Scarcely had she dropped the missive into the post than, half-frightened, half-ashamed at her own presumption, she would gladly have recalled it. A day or two afterward a carriage stopped at the door of her father's little shop in Cambrewell, and a lady alighted and inquired for the girl who opened the door for Jane Price. "I am Jane Price," was the timid reply. "And are you the lassie that has written to Tom?" said the lady—Mrs. Carlyle. It required some little explanation before the blushing girl clearly understood that her visitor was the wife of "Tom," and that he had been so favorably impressed by the letter that he wished to see the writer. She was taken in the carriage to Chelsea, where she remained overnight; and from that day down to the present time, although she is Jane Price no longer, she has been a weekly and welcome visitor there.

How completely the Land League has overcome the considerations which have heretofore so largely influenced the minds of Irishmen is seen in the fact of such a man as Lord Granard having been compelled to invoke the aid of dragoons and constabulary. Lord Granard is among the dozen noblemen of consequence who always reside in Ireland. Except to attend the session in London, he has for twenty years rarely quitted his estates. His father's mother, the Countess of Moira—the friend and patroness of Maria Edgeworth—became, although by birth English, more Irish than the Irish themselves, and Moira House, her magnificent home on Usher's Quay, Dublin, was, ninety years ago, not merely that city's most brilliant social centre, but the very focus of the anti-Union party, of which her husband, her son (the famous Marquis of Hastings), and her son-in-law, Lord Granard, were most active members. The present Lord Granard, inheriting the traditions of his house, expressed, on more than one occasion, opinions so Irish, from a patriotic Irish Catholic point of view, as to lead to his resigning—the resignation being expected by the Government—the Lord Lieutenancy of Leitrim, as he is, too, head of the Catholic Union of Ireland, and on terms of the closest intimacy with the prelacy. Moreover, his first wife, a great heiress, was descended from one of the victims of 1798; but all this has proved to be of no avail in the present agitation.

SLIGHTLY [illegible] who [illegible] and addressed a man coming into church after a service had begun, with the remark: "Glad to see you, sir; come in; always glad to see those here who can't come early." And [illegible] the man thus addressed [illegible] presence of an astonished congregation, as he responded: "Thank you; would you favor me with the text?"

THE BEST REMEDY FOR Diseases of the Throat and Lungs.

In diseases of the pulmonary organs a safe and reliable remedy is invaluable. AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL is such a remedy, and no other so eminently merits the confidence of the public. It is a scientific combination of the medicinal principles and curative virtues of the finest drugs, chemically united, of such power as to insure the greatest possible efficiency and uniformity of results. It strikes at the foundation of all pulmonary diseases, affording prompt relief and rapid cures, and is adapted to patients of any age or either sex. Being very palatable, the youngest children take it readily. In ordinary Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Bronchitis, Influenza, Clergyman's Sore Throat, Asthma, Croup, and Catarrh, the effects of AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL are magical, and multitudes are annually preserved from serious illness by its timely and faithful use. It should be kept at hand in every household for the protection it affords in sudden attacks. In Whooping-cough and Consumption there is no other remedy so efficacious, soothing, and helpful.

Low prices are inducements to try some of the many mixtures, or syrups, made of cheap and ineffective ingredients, now offered, which, as they contain no curative qualities, can afford only temporary relief, and are sure to deceive and disappoint the patient. Diseases of the throat and lungs demand active and effective treatment; and it is dangerous experimenting with unknown and cheap medicines, from the great liability that these diseases may, while so trifled with, become deeply seated or incurable. Use AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL, and you may confidently expect the best results. It is a standard medical preparation, of known and acknowledged curative power, and is as cheap as its careful preparation and fine ingredients will allow. Eminent physicians, knowing its composition, prescribe it in their practice. The test of half a century has proven its absolute certainty to cure all pulmonary complaints not already beyond the reach of human aid.

A Hawk and a Rattlesnake.

From the Arizona Globe Chronicle.

My musing on the ages of change that it must have taken to mould the scene to its present aspect were broken in upon by a large rattlesnake gliding out on a bare rock within fifty feet of the point where I was sitting. He seemed to search around like a dog for a place to suit his snakeship, and then streched himself out to enjoy the warmth. I was thinking if it were worth while to heave a stone at the monster, when a big shadow swept down and a hawk nearly caught him napping, but not quite. The snake sprang his rattle and coiled himself ready for attack, while the hawk hovered round, making a dash, now on the right and now on the left. It was quite an interesting skirmish, but at last the snake made a spring and apparently failed to strike, and before he could recoil himself the hawk seized him with both talons close behind the head. In fact, he had him on the neck, and swept into the air, while the snake struggled and twisted, away up into the blue in wide circling sweeps, until the struggling reptil hung limp and lifeless, when the hawk came down to earth again, and, alighting on a neighbouring tree, made his meal on the snake.

A party of scholastic exiles from Germany have come to Texas, with a view of buying land in the southwestern part of the State, and founding a community of a cooperative or communal character. Go Slow.

MADGE ELLIOTT.

When you a pair of bright eyes meet,
That make your heart in rapture beat;
When one voice seems to you more sweet
Than any other voice you know,
Go slow, my friend, go slow;
For brightest eyes have oft betrayed,
And sweetest voice of youth and maid
The very falsest thing have said,
And thereby wrought a deal of woe:
Go slow, my friend, go slow.

When you're convinced you are a poet,
And wishing all the world to know it,
Call on some editor to show it,
Your verses full of glow and blow,
Go slow, my friend, go slow;
For many a one has done the same,
And thought to grasp the hand of Fame,
And yet has never seen his name
In print. And why—waste baskets know;
Go slow, my friend, go slow.

When you to greed for money yield,
And long the mighty pow'r to wield
That's always found in golden field,
With senseless pomp and pride and show,
Go slow, my friend, go slow;
For thousands, tempted by the glare
Of wealth, have fallen in the snare
Set for the thief. And now despair,
Regret, and shame have brought them low:
Go slow, my friend, go slow.

The good old earth is never wrong;
Each of her works takes just so long;
Months pass before a happy throng
Of daisies in the meadows grow:
Go slow, my friend, go slow.
And spring gives life to summer's flow'rs,
And summer's sun and summer's show'rs
Prepare the fruit for autumn bow'rs,
And autumn frost brings winter snow;
Go slow, my friend, go slow.

HIS VICTORIA CROSS

By the Author of "A STRANGE WEDDING-EVE," "CLARE STANHOPE'S DIAMONDS," &c.

"Gherutpoor was a small fortified town that commanded the road to Kotul, and, as you know, it had an English Resident and a small garrison, but not enough to offer much resistance. But then Gherutpoor had immense natural advantages, and a very small force was sufficient to keep in check a good many Sepoys. It was impregnable—or was thought to be so till McLeod was found to have evacuated it without a blow, and fallen back on Kotul. It was the maddest thing to do, because Gherutpoor was, so to speak, the key to that district, and, for aught he knew, reinforcements were miles away. However, he yielded up that fortress without trying to keep it, and retreated towards Kotul, as I told you. Of course he was pursued—thousands to his hundreds—and no one between Kotul, with its slender garrison and its women and children, but that little band of men.

"I think, if I'd been McLeod, I must have gone mad. However, when it was too late, he made a stand; but, by Jove, you might as well have tried to stem a tide with a pocket-handkerchief! It was just a massacre; they fought like lions, he and his men. They told me he seemed like a man inspired and seemingly invulnerable, but it was of no use; every man of them would have been cut to pieces but just then up came reinforcements from Barret's column, expecting to relieve McLeod at Gherutpoor. The tables were turned then, I can tell you; the villanous Sepoys were routed, and McLeod and about half a dozen men rescued.

"I was with the reinforcements, you know, and so was Verner, the father of these girls at Ridinghurst; he rushed forward just as a fellow was going to cut down McLeod, and slashed his head off as neatly as I could amputate a leg. But I'll never forget McLeod's look or his words," said the Surgeon gravely and sadly; "there was a kind of fierce despair in his face as he turned to Verner.

"'Why didn't you let me die?' was all he said. But——"

Ferguson filled and emptied a glass of wine before he went on.

"Of course there was a row—a regular flare-up from one end of India to the other. All sorts of yarns were afloat, all sorts of charges made. There was a court-martial; and all McLeod said before it was that he thought the place untenable, and did the best he could for his men; beyond that he made no defence. The only witnesses he called were the men saved with him, to speak to his courage, and to testify that he did not shirk going into action. He had given proof before of splendid valour. Well, the decision was not made known, but he was sent to England under arrest to have the sentence confirmed at the Horse Guards. He was a Queen's officer, I ought to tell you. The upshot of the affair was that the original sentence was quashed. There was no evidence, the authorities said, of want of courage, although there had been a grave error of judgment. I forget the exact details; he was censured, but retained his position in his regiment. Whether interest had anything to do with it I don't know, but his father was a big-wig. Still his career was blighted; almost to a man the Army condemned him, and the Horse Guards have quietly shelved him ever since. He has applied, I know, in every war since to be allowed to volunteer in any position—but, no, they won't give him a chance.

"His father wouldn't see him again after that; he had had such high hopes of him—though they say the old man loved best a younger brother who has been dead some time, I fancy. It's a wonder to me how McLeod could stand the Army after it all, so proud as he is too. But I suppose he is always hoping to retrieve his character, and, may be, he thinks it would be deserting, as it were, to cut the Army."

There was moment's silence when the Surgeon had finished his recital; a gloom seemed to have fallen upon every one. Lord Kennedy roused himself with a shake.

"It was a wretched business from beginning to end," he said. "Some people thought he was made a sort of scape-goat for those who put him there. It seems to me it was a dangerous post to give to a young lieutenant of twenty, or so."

"Well, you see, for one thing it couldn't be helped," replied Ferguson, "because the number of officers had been thinned very much, and he was sent for the very reason too that he was such a dare-devil. I was never more astounded in my life than when I found McLeod had retreated on Kotul. General Dawnay wouldn't believe it at first. Verner, you know, used to vow that there had been some foul play, and he told me that he almost went down upon his knees to McLeod to get at the truth; but all McLeod said was that he had given the only explanation before the court-martial he could give."

"I suppose," said the Major drily, "there was no truth to be got at, save what the Colonel said."

"You're desperately hard, Major," observed the Doctor, shaking his head.

"No, sir; I like the discipline of the service to be upheld, that's all," retorted the Major.

"I know Verner used to think," remarked Ferguson, "there was jealousy among some of the fellows of McLeod; but I don't think that was borne out by facts."

"No, that's true enough," said Kennedy, frankly. "I don't blame the authorities at the time; what I do blame is the hostility that pursues him still. He was kept up at that wretched little station in the hills there for years; then after that tribe affair he came home and has been here ever since. They ought to have sent him out to Ashantee."

"Well, there's trouble looming in South Africa," said Fairleigh. "Perhaps he'll get a chance."

"Humph, I've no faith in the sagacity of the War Office," growled Ferguson.

"Oh, you're a Highlander, Doctor!" said Kennedy, laughing. "You all hang together like limpets to a rock. You're teaching treason to this youngster here."

"Pooh!" returned the Doctor. "The youngest cadet in the service has his growl at head-quarters. There's not much to be taught in that line; is there Fairleigh?"

Fairleigh laughed and looked knowing, but said to Lord Kennedy as the party broke up—

"I like the Chief immensely. He seems to me just one of those fellows for whom his men would do anything."

"Yes, that is so, I believe. You know," said Kennedy, with a frank laugh, "that nearly half my misgivings about the thing are because McLeod is a man you can't help liking. He's reserved and proud—cold, some say, but I don't know. There's a something about him that draws men in spite of themselves. His men like him—they can't help it. And of course the young ones that come in have no particular prejudice. The Mutiny is like the time before the Flood to them."

"It would be odd if they didn't like him," said Ferguson stoutly. "There isn't a man in the army who devotes himself to his work as McLeod does. There's nothing he won't do to set on foot any scheme for the soldier's welfare. Ah, I know a few things about him that some don't! It's he mainly who keeps the hospital for the women and children going. He started the reading-room in the High Street, and took care that the regulations were framed on a sensible foundation."

"The band's his pet weakness, though," said Kennedy, laughing. "What he spends on that—time and money! Well, it's the best in the service, I will say; and, if ever there was an enthusiast in music, Colonel McLeod is that man."

Then the conversation drifted away from the Colonel, the card-tables were set out, and play soon absorbed the attention of all.

CHAPTER IV.

Colonel McLeod had all the pride of his race, and he had the sensitiveness which belong to a fine and noble temperament. He could never have sued for a reversal of the tacit sentence passed upon him. He simply did his duty, without looking for reward. When riding back coolly into the very midst of the enemy's ranks during the frontier insurrection of which the Doctor had spoken, in order to save the life of one of his wounded men, no vision of that magic cross of gun-metal had floated before his eyes. That was not for him; he had saved the man, and the man had thanked him with tears in his eyes; and while he lived he had followed McLeod faithfully—that was the Colonel's Victoria Cross. What he suffered lay between Heaven and his own conscience.

Colonel McLeod had begun life with brightest hopes. He was ambitious, and had glorious visions of future greatness. He had, young as he was, the confidence of his superiors, and was trusted, nay, loved, by both officers and men. Such was Loris McLeod at twenty. In the Loris McLeod of twenty years later the bright hopes and the soaring ambition lay shattered. He was banished from his father's home; for the old man, stern and terribly proud, was cut to the heart by this stain on the old name, and he never saw his eldest-born again. He died while Loris was still in India. Sometimes Loris marvelled how he had lived through those twenty years; how it was that, as each year had passed away on leaden wings, he had not ceased to cling desperately to the one thing left him, the profession he loved. He could not yield up his profession. To him it wounld have seemed a mean and cowardly act, like a desertion of his colors; and he hoped too that one day England would need his word.

The coming of the Verner girls seemed to have worked something like a revolution in the Colonel's solitary life, not only in habits, but in his own mental consciousness. It compelled him to take an interest in things of which he had grown weary; it forced him away from the constant presence of that dull brooding pain that had never left him for twenty long years; it brought to him, despite his certainty that no girl could care for him, a home interest, home responsibility; there was somebody to whom he could give pleasure, and Cecil's bright, fresh young spirit was like the mounatin air to a sick man. Her enthusiasm, her naive ideas, yet her unshaken faith in goodness and purity, all fell "like dew" on the spirit of the man who had learned to "take the world as he found it." The girl filled a gap in the Colonel's life, although he scarcely knew himself yet in what way. To him at present she was half child, half woman, and he had for her an infinitely tender reverence.

A month had passed away since the two girls had come to live at Ridinghurst, and they were now as thoroughly at home as though they had lived there all their lives. A lady of middle age, a kinswoman of the Colonel, had taken up her residence with them, and she soon became a great favourite with her young charges. Masters came down from London for them; Colonel McLeod himself went to London to choose horses for them to ride, and for the pretty little victoria which he chose to think necessary to their happiness; and, in short, Albert Verner's daughters were treated as though they had been McLeod's; nothing short of that would have suited Loris McLeod's notions of friendship.

The girls were both happy, although in different ways and for different reasons. Cecil could have been happy anywhere and anyhow with the Colonel; Alice could have been happy in Ridinghurst with or without him. She was a year younger than Cecil; but, while Cecil had not yet awakened to the knowledge that she had a heart, Alice had already set her's on lovers and admirers; she longed to "come out," to be the centre of attraction to spurred and uniformed heroes. If a lieutenant in his handsome uniform saluted Colonel McLeod in the street and glanced towards her—although probably it was Cecil on whom his eyes really rested—she began straightway to weave a dream therefrom; and she thought it a hardship that none of the officers ever came to Ridinghurst, except that horrid Doctor Ferguson and Lord Kennedy, who, dropping in to luncheon once, talked to Cecil half the time, and evidently looked upon Alice as a child.

It is probable that, for his wards' sake, if he had thought it best for them, Colonel McLeod would have even compelled himself to endure society, which could only be a continual torment to him. But he was glad that their youth precluded the necessity of opening his door to a number of idle young officers who had nothing better to do than lounge in ladies' drawing-rooms and flirt with pretty girls. When the girls were older, of course he must do what was best for them; but at present no one would expect to see them brought out.

"Why don't you ever see any one, Colonel McLeod?" Alice had asked once, half coaxingly; and he answered, smiling, that he was too busy, and that the sisters were too young.

"And too busy," Cecil had added gravely. "If we went out Ailie, we should have no time to practice and read and study."

"Study! You talk as if we were going to be governesses;" and Alice pouted.

Cecil flushed and looked down; her sensitive spirit was wounded, and a grave shade had come over the Colonel's brow. He said nothing; but, in passing Cecil, he paused to lay his hand on her shoulder and ask her some simple question about her music. Alice's remark however had given shape to a vague burden which had weighed on Cecil's heart.

Colonel McLeod sat alone in his library one evening; that was one of the habits he had not given up. The girls were in the drawing-room with Mrs. Annandale. Cecil used sometimes to wish that the Colonel would come to; but Colonel McLeod thought that they must like to be alone now and then, and that his presence would be a restraint on them. Nevertheless the library seemed very lonely to the Colonel, even though old Celia, who lay stretched on the tiger-skin, looked up fondly every time his master came near him in his walk up and down, or let his book drop on his knee, to rest his head on his hand and stroke his moustache thoughtfully.

Presently the Colonel heard a gentle tap at the door, and he said "Come in" rather dreamily; but he rose quickly as he saw a tall lithe black-robed figure cross the floor in the red glow of ... light ...

"Am I disturbing you, Colonel McLeod?" asked Cecil, pausing just on the rug. "May I speak to you for a moment?"

"An hour, if you wish, my dear child," he answered, half-smiling. ... There was ... library ... "I ... ... to your ... Sit here"—drawing forward the reading-chair.

She sat down, resting her slender hands on her knee. It seemed a little difficult for her to begin; but, after a few moments' pause, she said, looking into the blaze—

"I wanted very much, Colonel McLeod, to speak to you about my future; it has troubled me for some time."

He raised his hand to shade his eyes, resting his arm on the mantelpiece, and said quietly—

"In what way, Cecil? What do you mean?"

"Do you remember what Alice said the other day about being governesses?" said Cecil. "That made me think a great deal; it brought definitely before me that I at least ought to—that we have—— I mean we have no right to be staying here as we are, with the idea that we shall never have to earn our own living."

She finished bravely; but she had found it very hard to speak, and harder because the Colonel was silent, and she could not see his face. Was he angry? she wondered. She rose quickly and came and laid her hand on his arm half entreatingly.

"Please do not be vexed with me," she said tremulously; "but I know that my father left scarcely anything for us, and yet you make no difference; and I wanted so to tell you that I had no idea of always being a burden on your kindness."

"Hush, child—oh, Cecil, hush!"

It was as though she had wounded him deeply. His voice was full of unutterable pain; not voluntarily had the appeal broken from him, not for worlds would he have her know how she had pained him. Did she not give tenfold, he thought, for all she received? His kindness! It seemed such mockery to talk to him of "kindness" to these helpless children—kindness to Cecil, to Albert Verner's "dear lassies." The girl looked startled and wistful; but the words had scarcely passed his lips ere he had controled himself, and he said, looking down into the clear eyes raised to his—

"Is the obligation a burden to heavy for you to bear, my child? What put such ideas into your head?"

"I have thought of it for a long time, Colonel McLeod. I know I could do nothing now, because I don't know how; but in a year perhaps I could teach——"

"Would you like to leave Ridinghurst?"

"But we cannot do always as we like," answered the girl, without directly replying to the question.

The Colonel smiled a little bitterly and turned away, moving a few paces off; then, returning, he laid his hands on Cecil's shoulders.

"What shall I do, Cecil, to clear your simple heart of the idea that all the gratitude is from you to me?" he said softly. "Do you think you are very much in my way?"

"Oh, no! But we are not of your kith," answered the girl, with down-cast eyes. "We cannot always look to you for support. It is not pride, indeed, Colonel McLeod." She spoke eagerly now. "You will understand that, won't you?"

"I think I understand you fully, my child," said McLeod gravely, but with infinite tenderness. "You are a dear child to think of what you have told me. But you are troubling your mind with thoughts and misgivings that need never exist. There is no question of burden, obligation, or gratitude, that should overwhelm you. You are only a little over seventeen now; but, if influence can do anything, you should never have my consent to leave this house, except—except for a home of your own. You know nothing of the world, now, my child"—half sadly—"it is a cruel world even to the strong; and you—a brave spirit alone will not bear you scathless through the battle."

The girl's eyes filled with tears; the words she uttered dropped from her lips almost unconsciously.

"The world has been cruel to you, Colonel McLeod?"

He dropped her hands abruptly and turned away, growing pale. Yet the question did not wound him, coming from her. Cecil remembered instantly that she had no right to ask that question, and impulsively she sprang to his side.

"Forgive me—I did not mean to say that," she said, in such an earnest beseeching tone that it almost made him smile. "I am so thoughtless."

"Dear child, you have not wounded me; that is not possible," he answered gently. "I will tell you something, Cecil; it may set your heart at rest. Long ago, when I would have rushed recklessly on death, it was your father's hand that snatched me back. I did not thank him for the boon. I counted it none then; 'afterwards'"—he dropped his voice, and set his teeth for a moment, as though it cost him much to speak—"afterwards, while all others censured me—I do not say wrongly—only one stood by me, unshaken in faith, and that man was your father. Have I not said enough to show you how impossible it is for me ever to cancel my obligation to him and his? Something of this I said to you the first day you came; but not so much. So let that rest, if you can be content here." He paused; the doubt was of himself, not her.

"Content! Oh, Colonel McLeod," cried Cecil, almost passionately, "could I be otherwise than happy here? Who could be unhappy when you are so kind, so noble?"

"It takes very little to make you happy, Cecil," returned the Colonel, smiling; but her words had sent a wild thrill of joy through his heart. "A great deal of music and——"

"And you, Colonel McLeod," said Cecil. "Don't put yourself in the background." She looked up smiling now, though tears still rested on the long lashes. "I won't pain you again; but, indeed, I could not rest until I had spoken to you; and I did not know what you told me this evening, else I had never spoken."

What Resulted from a Clean Shave.

(Special Translations.)

On the occasion of Queen Victoria's visit to France in 1860, the prefect of the Seine charged a celebrated architect with the task of organizing a fete which he desired to give in her honour.

The architect assumed the work, and demanded to be presented to the queen as a recompense.

"Looking like a billy-goat as you do," exclaimed the prefect. "Cut off your beard and I will present you."

"Cut off my beard? never!"

For several days the unhappy architect vacillated between his love for his beard and his desire to see the English sovereign.

The latter feeling, however, proved the stronger, and at the last moment he shaved his face clean, and presented himself at the Hotel de Ville, where he never left the side of the prefect.

The presentations took place, but in spite of his efforts to attract the attention of the prefect, the architect was never presented. When the queen had departed he turned indignantly upon the prefect and said:

"Why didn't you present me?"

"Present you! On what pretext?"

"As the originator of the fete; as your architect."

"Mon Dieu," exclaimed the prefect. "I didn't know you with your beard off."

A Very Uncommon Mania.

Burton, the traveler, tells us that a melancholy Duke of Muscovy, fell ill if he but looked upon a woman, and that another anchorite was seized with a cold palsy under similer circumstances. Here is a case of a lady having an aversion to the opposite sex; it appeared in the obituary of a newspaper some 50 years ago: "Lately, at Gray's Alms-houses, Taunton, aged 82, Hannah Murton, a maiden lady. She vowed several years ago that no fellow should ever touch her living or dead. In pursuance of this resolution, about ten years since she purchased a coffin, in which, whenever she felt serious illness, she immediately deposited herself, thus securing the gratification of her peculiar sensibility." There are many similar cases to this lady's on record, though they are manifested in a more imperfect way.

The snow in the West has been particularly damaging to the sheep men. One firm who are wintering their flocks near Copperopolis, Montana, have lost nearly half of them. They have hay, but the sheep drifted away from it during a storm, and they now find it impossible to get their sheep to the hay or the hay to the sheep.

THE STANDARD.

NOTICE.

THE Canada Advertising Agency, No. 29 King Street West, Toronto, W. W. BUTCHER, Manager, Is authorized to receive advertisements for this paper.

The people of the County will place a proper value on the advice given them by the Thornbury paper, when they take into consideration that all the abuse of Owen Sound and its High School arises from the fact, that the proprietor did not get the advertisement announcing the re-opening of the school, amounting to the large sum of one dollar and fifty cents.

There has been nothing done as yet about cleaning those filthy closets belonging to the public School, and we suppose nothing will be done until some epidemic breaks out among the children, and carries off a score or so of them. They are simply a disgrace to a civilized people, and the smell arising therefrom during the thaw was quite perceptible from the road. Think of nearly 200 children being compelled to breath such an atmosphere for six hours every day.

We last week published a speech delivered by Dr. Sproule, the member for the East Riding of Grey, on the Pacific Railway contract, and have given great offence for so doing. The speech was sent to us with a request that we would find a place for it in our columns, and told to send in the bill and we would be paid for it the same as for any other advertisement. Had our member been a Reformer, and his speech against the Syndicate been offered to us on the same terms, we should have published it without the slightest hesitation. If those parties who are grumbling, are desirous of having any particular speech, opposing the one in question, published, and are willing to pay 5c per line for the privelege, they will find us accommodating. We publish the STANDARD to benefit ourselves, as well as the public, and as long as we are paid for the insertion of an article it will always find a place in our columns, provide it does not trench on private character, or is not of an immoral nature; and as long as we make no comments either for or against, we do not consider we are compromising our position of neutrality.

At the last meeting of the County Council a motion was made to have the County Treasurer advertise all lands, liable to be sold for taxes, in the papers published in the immediate locality of such lands, in addition to that required by law.

The mover gave as his reason for making the motion, that as the law now stood the tax sales were ordered to be advertised in one paper only, and the consequence was that very may of those, whose lands were advertised, were not aware of it, from the fact of their never seeing the paper containing the advertisement. Had they been published in the local papers he felt assured that much of the land now sold would be redeemed by thier owners. The motion, however, was thrown out on the ground that, as the law only authorized the one advertisement, the extra cost of such publication would have to be borne by the County, as it could not legally be charged against the lots so advertised. No doubt this is true, but we can't see why, instead of sending the lands to be sold to one particular paper, for publication, they are not sent to the papers where the parties interested would be most likely to see them. If the law as it now stands prevents this method, it is time people were moving to have it remedied. If it is the duty of the County Council to make the move, and they neglect doing so, the people should see to it at the next election of Reeves and Deputies, that men are sent who will. Undoubtedly a great deal of hardship is caused by the present, system and the sooner a change is made the better.

JOTTINGS FROM MAXWELL.

From a Correspondent.

Beautiful weather again. Sleighing good.

The Literary and Debating Society intend giving an entertainment soon. May it be a success. The last meeting of the society was quite a success. Among the noteworthy points of the programme, were the excellent recitation of Mr. W. L. B. Hamlin, sr., and the amusing reading of Mr. W. L. B. Hamlin, jr. A very interesting spelling match also took place. After a keenly contested combat, one side was vanquished, the other having four still on the floor.

The subject of the next debate is: "Resolved, That the the Negro has sustained more injury from the hands of the white man, than the Indian."

Our worthy Counsellor. Mr. Ross, has, during the past week, entered upon the matrimonial state of life.—He has the Society's best wishes.—Now that the ice is broken, we may expect several others to follow Mr. Ross' example. SERMO.

FLESHERTON.

SOCIAL.—The greatest event of the season was the Odd Fellows Social, which was held in their Hall on Wednesday evening, the 19th inst. Over a hundred persons answered the invitations which were sent out. It has seldom been our good fortune to witness such a gay and enjoyable scene. The hall has lately been re-carpeted and painted, at an expense of $100, and presented a lively appearance.

The meeting was opened by singing the "Opening Ode" of the Order.—Bro. W. Trimble occupied the N. G. Chair; Bro. H. Hooper, the V. G. Chair, the other officers and members took their respective positions, all appearing in their glittering uniform or regalia.

After singing the [illegible] a very elaborate address of welcome, thanking the assembly for the manner in which they had responded to the invitations sent out. After which the company engaged in various games and sports provided for their amusement. The Quartette Band enlivened the proceedings at intervals with choice selections of music. At 10.30 o'clock a sumptuous repast was served after which a well prepared programme was very creditably rendered. Songs were given by the Misses W. and J. Trimble, Christoe and Philps. Readings by B. Davis and H. Hooper, and last, but not least, the song and recitation of Dinwoody Bros. The programme was brought to a close by all signing God Save the Queen. It would not be too much to note the very orderly way in which everything was conducted, and among those most assiduous in making the company at home, we would mention Messrs, Wright. Trimble, Hooper, Doll, Flesher, Campell, Davis Blackburn, Sproule and Sullivan.

BREVITIES.—Spring is coming...... Mr. Sarjeant is "laying in" a good supply of ice for the summer......The Social held at Mr. Anderson's, on the 11th inst., under the auspices of the Presbyterian Sabbath School, was a success. The amount realized $13.85. ......The Social given by the C. M. Ladies Aid Association in the basement of the church last Friday evening was also a success. The proceeds at the door amounting to $18.50...... Rev. Mr. Wilson (Presbyterian) preached a very eloquent sermon in the Town Hall, last Sabbath afternoon. His text was the "Prodigal Son."...... The Flesherton Choir (Methodist) has two alto singers second to none in the County.......Hooper's Furniture Ware Rooms are well worth inspecting. Any person having a few minutes to spare, while in the Village, should pay them a visit.

NOTICE.—We wish it disinctly understood, that we do not hold ourselves reponsible for the opinions expressed by our correspondents.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

MAYSVILLE, Colorada, Jan., 1881.

Maysville is a smart mining town in Chaffee County, located at the mouth of the North Fork, of the South Arkansas River, in an open sunny spot, making it a desirable winter residence. The pioneer settler of the town is Amasa Feathers, upon whose ranch the place was laid out. The town has had a steady growth during the past season, and notwithstanding the unfavorable weather, new buildings are still in course of erection. The census for 1880 gives the population at 600, but that hardly furnishes an accurate idea of the actual population from which the place derives its support, as there are hundreds of miners in the gulches and hills above who get their supplies at Maysville. The capitalist seeking to invest in the mines of the district, also makes this his headquarters. The railroad, Denver & Rio Grande, is practically completed to this point, and will probably make it a terminus for one year or more. The principal firm in Maysville is the heavy grocery and supply house of Johnston & Rondol, who also have a banking office, and supply the citizens with needed facilities in the way of exchange. They are shrewd business men, always foremost in everything pertaining to the welfare of the town. The hardware trade is represented by Sullivan Bros. They carry a large and complete stock. Maysville has four hotels, six restaurants, and eight saloons, two blacksmith shops. The livery, feed and sale trade is represented by Griggs & Meyers, and the boss stable by Shorey & Reynolds, the latter being from Markdale. It would be impossible in the limits of a short newspaper article for me to write up the business of a town like Maysville. To any and all who think of investing in mines we say make Maysville your headquarters, as it is a beautiful and desirable place to live in, well located and inhabited by a good class of people. We boast of but one church, known as the Union Church, of Maysville, but you must bear in mind our town is not yet two years old. The mines in this section have not been developed to such an extent as to enable the owners to carry on work all winter, consequently the opening of cold weather and heavy snows in the mountains, make it necessary to shut down all work except on those properties that are provided with shaft houses, boarding houses and other facilities for winter. This makes our town as well as all other purely mining towns, similarly situated, comparatively dull at this season of the year. The mines of this section are among the richest in the state. At the head of the Kangaroo Gulch, is the famous Columbus mines, whence a rather steep trail is utilized to pack supplies up and ore down; the mine was sold late last fall to a New York Company for $100,000, and is stocked now to the amount of $1,000,000. The manager, Mr. G. K. Sabin, is an old time Colorado miner; a boarding house 14x81, has been erected; an ore house 14x60, and getting the mine in shape to take out 80 tons of ore daily. The mine is near the top of one of the high peaks in the range. The Black Tiger is an other famous mine, sold for $50,000; the Brighton for $100,000, Men that are poor are made rich in less than an hour, but not all of them. Prospecting is a trade, but when you strike it you are fixed; that is a common saying among the boys. There are hundreds of mines I have not spoken of or have any idea of doing so. I left Markdale in February 1880, and drove to Maysville in 60 days, arriving here last April, a distance of over 2,000 miles. Shortly after settling here, I met a Mr. Charles Richardson, brother of Mr. George Richardson, of Euphrasia, who also strayed to the "West." The weather here is warm, no snow in the immediate vicinity. Once this winter the thermometer stood 14 below zero.

CHURCH OPENING.—The new Canada Methodist Church at Thornbury, the corner stone of which was laid by our worthy M. P., Dr. T. S. Sproule, was opened on Sunday, 20th inst. The dedicatory services being conducted by the Rev. N. R. Willoughby, president of the Toronto Conference, assisted by the Revs. Starr, Mayn and Elliott. An eloquent and practical sermon, from the text—"Because Thou hast been my help, therefore in the shadow of Thy wings will I rejoice," Psalm LXIII, 8, was delivered by Mr. Willoughby to a very large congregation, in fact a number were obliged to stand during the services, the church being so crowded.—The church is a handsome brick building, with all modern improvements, a credit to the people of Thornbury and Clarksburg, who have errected and carried to completion such a handsome edifice. A very successful tea meeting was held the following evening, the church being litterally packed, and many having to go away for want of room. The balance of the cost of building ($8,000) was fully provided for by subscription at the tea meeting. The Presbyterian church between Thornbury and Clarksburg, which is similar to and erected at the same time as the C. M. Church, was dedicated the Sunday previous.—COM.

OUR CHAMPION.

BY WILLIAM CLARK.

England whose flag so long has braved,
The battle and the breeze,
Maintains her proud position still
As mistress of the seas.
While on the Tyne and classic Thames,
Her sturdy sons long bore,
A reputation undenied,
As champion of the oar.
Till far Australia, as her best,
Sent Trickett o'er the maine,
From brave old Sadler's grasp to wrest,
The universal name.
The glory thus was not transferred,
To foe or foreign power;
But England's daughter fair, had come
To claim it as her dower.
Lo! in the west a star appears,
No rival can withstand,
As Hanlan, his canadian oar,
Plies with a master's hand.
Louden and Plaisted vainly try,
His powers to confine;
At Burlington and on the bay,
He brought them both to time.
He sweeps Canadian waters fair,
He sweeps Columbia's streams;
Though Rieley, Ross and Courtney dare,
To test his honest claims.
Hawden and Elliott on the Tyne,
Essay to pull him down;
These contests all unite to prove
His well deserved renown.
When from Australia's distant shore,
The Sydney giant came,
With half a million gold, or more,
To vindicate his claim.
Our Hanlan took the gauntlet up,
In true Canadian style;
Throughout the course he led the way,
And cooly drew the pile.
Then, jealous of his country's name,
Brave Laycock takes the track,
And fondly courts another chance
To win her honors back.
Benignly Hanlan grants him this,
Yet camly holds the field,
While muscle, nerve, and will remain,
His place he cannot yield.
Now o'er the Atlantic's wave he comes,
To greet his native shore,
With universal honors crown'd
As monarch of the oar.
We'll light the torch, we'll hoist the flag,
In honor of the day
When on the Thames he proved his right,
To universal sway.
Long may he live to bravely hold,
The place so bravely won,
And in declining years may peace,
Surround his setting sun.
And when his day is past and gone,
And only known to fame,
Canadian hands shall bind a wreath
Round Edward Hanlan's name.

A PIECE OF SOUND ADVICE

1st, Don't borrow money, if you do you will be under a compliment, and compliments of this kind are expected to be paid back with interest.

2nd, Don't borrow money in order to make a fine display before the world, because after the show is over the world will laugh at you if you have lost your property.

3rd, Don't be fooled into borrowing money by reading flash advertisements about straight loans &c. the result is always the same in the end, you will find them crooked enough before you are done with them.

4th, Remember the borrower is servant to the lender, and has to pay well for the privilege.

But if you cannot avoid borrowing give me a call, and you will find that we can accommodate you, at reasonable interest. [illegible]

One of the most loathsome and terrible diseases of our climate is Chronic Catarrh. When the poisoning matter is constantly falling upon the lungs. Pulmonary Consumption is certain to follow. Expell morbid secretion from the Bronchial pipes by Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam, the great throat and lung healer. Sold by all dealers at 25 cents per bottle.

WE have to chronicle the very sudden death, in Toronto, this week, of Dr. Tuck, of Orangeville, who, while talking to a friend to all appearance in robust health, fell forward in a fit, and notwithstanding the best efforts of the medical men who were called in, he breathed his last in the course of an hour.

ACCIDENT ON THE T., G. & B. RAILWAY.—As the afternoon train was coming from Mount Forest last Thursday, crossing Cameron's Bridge, the engine jumped the track, taking four cars with it, and leaving the coach almost over. The engineer and fireman jumped and saved their lives.—The passengers escaped with nothing worse than a fright.

ROBERT DAVIS, Auctioneer, has been authorized by Messrs. A. & F Beattie, lot No. 130, 1st Range S. W. Toronto and Sydenham Road to sell by auction, on March 3rd, their entire stock of thorough-bred and grade cattle, implements, &c. By furnishing good joint notes, you can get 11 months' credit on all purchases above $5. Parties wishing to obtain good cattle should not fail to attend.

Rheumatism is one of the most prevalent and obstinate diseases incident to our climate, but it has been disarmed of its terrors by that invincible remedy, Hagyard's Yellow Oil, an external and internal medicine whose application is so varied and useful in all painful and inflammatory diseases and wounds, as to render it a household necessity to all who suffer from pain.

I am pleased; well I am not only pleased, but delighted. My wife the other day was out shopping, and seeing some white shirts, innocently asked the price—women like, you know. When told ONLY ONE DOLLAR! She, without a moments hesitation, just bought half a dozen, saving about $2. Where did she get them? Why at McFarland's.

THE number of sudden death that have occurred lately is truly alarming, there being, according to the Mail, no less than nine in Toronto inside of one week. This only illustrates the truth of the saying, that "in the midst of life we are in death," and should impress on our minds the necessity of so living that, with His grace, we may be found, when our call comes, "not wanting."

What a multitude of martyrs suffer from Headache! either of the nervous or bilious form. The principal cause of the distress is disordered Stomach and Liver, for which Burdock Blood Bitters is a positive specific. It cures constipation of the Bowles, eliminates disease from the Kidneys, arouses the secretions to a healthy action purifies the blood, regulates the Liver, strengthens the debilitated system. Sample Bottles 10 cts. Regular size $1.00

WOMAN GOSSIP.

Seven Times a Widow, but Still in the Matrimonial Ring—A Passenger in the Wrong Berth.

Useful Hints as to Artistic Dress Effects—Encouragement for the Owners of Large Mouths.

Jealousy and Bad Pistol-Shooting—Kate Field's Toilets—Fashion Society Diversions.

Fashion Notes.

Long talma capes of silk or satin are stylish.

Red satin balayeuses are gradually disappearing.

A short dress made of rich material is admissible anywhere.

White or black jet bonnets are en regle for day or evening wear.

Bayadere striped plush is much used for trimming fancy costumes.

Cashmere drapes gracefully over skirts of white or colored satin.

Large hats for some faces are more dressy and becoming than small ones.

Short waists are coming in style again, and will be worn with short skirts ar trains.

Venetian point, Alencón, and real Spanish are three styles in laces which are now in special vogue.

The new tinted cashmeres are made into quaint house dresses in the Holland style of two centuries old.

Marked effect is given to sober-toned and black garments by the tendency to high coloring in the general styles of dress.

For evening and dinner dresses, young girls wear robes of light-colored nuns' veiling, or very light cashmere, trimmed with surah or satin.

Magnificent satin fabrics are imported covered with Vesuvius beads of fine quality, whose dazzling rays give the material the effect of being covered with precious stones.

The fashionable bracelet for the moment is a narrow band of hammered gold, from which depends a fine gold chain, and a circlet, inside of which is a diamond pendant.

Ball dresses of light materials, such as gauze, net, and crape, may be either plain or elaborately embroidered and finished with long garlands or wreaths of variously-colored flowers.

Very becoming indoor jackets are made of blue Hindoo cashmere, with wide borders of Oriental cashmere of the brightest colors. Ruffles of yellow lace are worn around the neck and wrists.

Fichus of India mull, decorated with hand-painted borders and edged wite Grecque lace, are worn crossed over the bodice in front, the sash ends being carried to the back and fastened with a bunch of Watteau ribbons.

Black Brussels net scarfs, appliqued with velvet leaves which are covered with iridescent beads, are worn upon bonnets of black plush. They are fastened at the sides of the hat with scarabees or beetles of the natural size.

The "Laveuse" polonaise, with upturned skirts, a la washerwoman, is still in favour. The polonaise is made of self-colored material, and the wide rever at the bottom is usually faced with plush, brocade or watered silk.

Shot glace silks, less expensive then brocades, are very fashionable for demi-toilet dresses, and are trimmed usually with satin or lace. These silks have in a degree taken the place of faille, whose popularity is completely at an end.

A novelty in underwear is the V-shaped chemise, with the yoke in that design formed of medallions in embroidery, alternating with bars or squares of Valenciennes or torchon lace, with edging to match. A handsome petticoat is finished with heavy Medesa lace in antique pattern.

Waits.

She many suitors did refuse,
With air composed and calm;
But when the right one asked her hand,
He carried off the palm.

A gentleman the other evening objected to playing cards with a lady, because, he said, she had such a winning way about her.

The time has arrived when an invitation to a wedding is equivalent to lending the groom ten dollars and feeling thankful that he didn't ask for more.

There is just as much vindictiveness wrapped up in the "O shucks!" of a woman as there is in the well-developed and complicated anathema of a Texas cowboy.

"Take back the love thou gav'st me," she sang. It was a love of a bonnet, but didn't match her complexion, and she wanted him to exchange it for one that did.

Pater familias: "Well, Jennie, if you must marry this winter, I suppose you must. Take either of them Jennie—the plumber or the coal dealer; both are good men."

The principal of a young ladies' seminary has so exhaustingly inflicted her pupils with "deportment" that, when left alone, her girls of 16 act like sixty.

"Do you favour my suit?" said Claud to Angelina, the other day. "Yes," was the crushing reply, "I look with more favour on the new clothes than I do on their owner."

Indiana has a law to prevent weak-minded persons marrying. A crusty bachelor insinuates that the weak-minded are the only persons who ever think of doing such a thing.

"I declare," said a gentleman to his lady-love, "you are very handsome." "Pooh," said the lady, "so you would say if you did not think so." "And so you would think," answered he, "though I should not say so."

A exchange tells of a young lady who, six months after a happy marriage, on being asked if she was much troubled with cold feet, simpered hesitatingly and with ingenuous simplicity replied: "Ye-yes; but—but they're not my own."

"A sea-skin sack, hey!" said Czardine to his oldest daughter. "Look at yer first mother. She wasn't allers askin' for seal-skin sacks. No, sir, a fig leaf satisfied her, and we learn that when she went to church the lilies of value want rigged up like her."

A well-known euchre-player named Down married a Miss Trump, which, according to the rules of the matrimonial game, turned the Trump Down. She then made it clubs and stove-pokers, and he has never been able to hold any hands since. We pass.

Land of the free: "You boast that your country is the land of liberty," said a young English nobleman, who had married an American lady, to a Yankee traveler at a London chop house. "You call it the 'ome of freedom and all that, but it's a beastly fact that I never lost my independence till I went there."

Georgeous Dresses.

Kate Field described to a Providence Journal reporter, the other day, the costumes made for her by worth, in which she is this winter dazzling American audiences at her entertainments. She stated that she had purchased five dresses which cost in the vicinity of $2,500, and had been pronounced models of elegance, and by all the terms in the enthusiastic vocabulary of feminine appreciation. She described one of these dresses, which was honoured with a description in a recent number of the London Court Circular. The style is Empress Josephine, the foundation being of new gold satin, and the back of the same. The front is of coffee-coloured velvet, trimmed adown the front with pearls, and on the bottom with lace and pearls. The bodice is cut square and filled in with lace, and the neck is adorned with a high ruffle of pearls. The colours of the dress are denominated bird of paradise, and blue satin plaiting is inserted between the coffee-coloured velvet and new gold. The style is one of the latest of Worth's inventions, and the costume is valued at $590. Pearl ornaments are worn with it. Miss Field then gave a racy description of a conversation she had with Worth in regard to the superiority of American satins over the French material, which grew out of her exhibition of a piece of American black and cardinal satin purchased in New Jersey. She sought to persuade him to order samples, and, after examining the material, the famous artist said: "Yes, I see that you are going to compete with us on our own ground; and I don't question that, in a few years, you will succeed in excelling us, because French silks are unquestionably deteriorating by reason of the use of sizing in the black shades, so that they quickly become shiny and creasy. But, much as I disapprove of the inferior condition of French silk, you can not expect me to injure the country of my adoption. The same spirit that actuates you to buy American silks here is the spirit that actuates me to uphold French manufactures. I will make up your material for you, but you can not expect me to give an order." "So, for the first time in the history of Parisian dressmaking," triumphantly said the saucy Kate, "American satins were made into a costume by Worth."

Something More Than Souvenirs.

Six years ago a lady of this city, says the Hartford Courant, was calling on a gentleman friend who had recently returned from a protracted sojourn in China, and who had brought back a large number of curiosities as presents. After admiring the many peculiar things from the Celestial empire, the gentleman gave her what she supposed to be a dozen ordinary smoked pearls as souvenirs. After a while they were laid away, but not until two of them had been given to a domestic in her household. A few days ago the lady was visited by an old friend from a distant part of the country, and her attention was called to the pin he wore on his scarf, recognizing it as similar to the "pearls" she had laid away. Her visitor told her that it was a cat's eye pearl from China, and that it was exceedingly rare and quite valuable, and was the prevailing rage among New York fashionables. The lady took her jems to a jeweler recently and had the satisfaction of learning that they were worth from $30 to $40 apiece, and now she is to have them set in a lace pin. They are a trifle larger than peas, and iridescent, and have in the centre of one of the flattened sides an almond-shaped spot of a different colour, which render them very similar to cat's eyes.

Why She Married Him.

The St. Petersburg correspondent of the Easler Nachrichten describes at length the "reconciliation scene" between the czar's wife, Princess Dolgorouki, and his daughter-in-law, the wife of the crown prince. It took place in Livadia. At the reception of his son and daughter-in-law, the czar, for the special honour of the latter, for whom he has always shown warm affection, worn the uniform of her own regiment—the Gatschina Cuirassiers—formerly the regiment of the Empress Maria. Immediately after the first greeting, which was very ardent, the czar turned to the crown princess eagerly and said: "Make a visit to my wife as early as possible." The lady replied that she would not delay it for a moment, and went straight to the apartments of the Princess Dolgorouki. When she appeared in the doorway she saw the czar's wife prostrate on her knees before the sacred "icon." The visitor remained standing. The new empress had not noticed her. As soon as the latter discovered her visitor she remained in her kneeling position, and turning her face, streaming with tears, upon the crown princess, she threw up her hands and exclaimed: "Forgive me! I have done it for my children's sake." The reconciliation between the two ladies is said to be complete.

Ladies, Lunches.

Ethereal and spirituelle as the New York girls are often supposed to be, they seem to develop most surprising appetites at the fashionable luncheons, and seek for invitations to them in a manner worthy of a better cause. Last winter, says a correspondent, the number of these ladies' luncheons was innumerable, and they have already begun this year, if possible, on a larger and more expensive scale. They afford opportunity for so much rivalry in regard to decorations of the room where served, of extravagance of menu, and in the providing of other attraction which may charm the ears or delight the eyes of other guests. In general, a ladies' luncheon, however, is served somewhat as follows: The date being fixed upon, and the list of guests made out, the invitations are sent, and, in almost every case, favorable answers soon received. Great must be the obstacle which prevents a girl from accepting an invitation to a ladies' luncheon. Doctor's advice is disregarded, other engagements thrown to the wind and gleeful acceptance joyfully penned. The drawing-room is then prepared for a number of small tables, holding from four to six girls at each, which are each spread with a snowy-white cloth, on which are placed glittering silver and china. A handsome dinner-card is laid at each place, and either a choice bouquet of roses or a beautiful bonbonniere fille with sweets. Care is taken that intimate friends, where possible—or, at least, girls who are congenial—shall sit at the same tables. Handsome hangings are drapad round the room, and the mantlepiece and chandelier are covered with choice flowers. The fashion this year is to entirely shut out the daylight with heavy portieres, and light the room entirely with wax candles. The rich soft glow which these produce, combined with the heavy hangings of the drawing-room in a city house, and the abundant flowers, makes a most charming picture. Maid-servants, trimly dressed, with snow-white aprons and caps, serve the lunch. This important feature of the entertainment consists of oysters, salads, and ices, together with confectionery of all sorts. Conversation is generally, of necessity, rather gossipy in its tendency, and happy is the young man of any society prominence whose name is not brought in and his character discussed. The tender mercies of a number of New York girls at a luncheon are, indeed, cruel.

Sweet Woman's Mouth.

Wide mouths have come into fashion for women. This is a change from the prevailing style of the past year or two. The proper mouth for the present season, says The New York Graphic, is worn in a constant but mild smile, the corners being drawn back horizontally, with the lips left closed. The expression is one of amiable, quiet satisfaction with all the world—as though the mind was free from sorrow and the feet free from corns. Care should be taken not to broaden this into an active grin, except on mirthful occasions; nor should the lips be compressed. All should be in repose. The lips may be reddened, if the natural color be too light. A practice of painting the exposed membrane of the upper lip broad and bright just at the centre has crept in, but it is bad, for it gives an artificial and sensuous look. The fashionable belle has cut the puckering string of her mouth and no longer murmurs "prunes prunes, prunes." She can kiss ten men simultaneously and give good satisfaction, where before only one could find room at a time. The reader who supposes that the above is fanciful and not plain, straightforward fashion news is very much mistaken. Women can change the style of their faces, if not at will, at least considerably. The hair over the forehead can be so arranged to produce a desired outline for the upper part of the face; the mouth can be made to widely vary its expression, the eyes can be kept partly wide open or languidly half-closed; the cheeks can be rounded by using "plumpers," the eyebrows can be arched or straightened; the colar can be controlled to a high degree. Thus it is apparent that women can, if clever, have to some extent the face she wants. The nose is about the only intractable feature. It sticks right out in unalterable independence, defraying all efforts to shorten or straighten it. Let me interpolate the fact that not one women in ten ever laughs or smiles naturally. Knowing full well our defects of teeth or expression, we try to hide or reform them. I know a girl who will never go to the minstrels or any other funny show because she isn't pretty when she laughs. If inadvertantly caught by something comic, she buries the laugh in a handkerchief; but whenever possible she does all her laughing internally. This wrenches her terribly, and sooner or later some of her vitals will get broken all to pieces; but she prefers death to a display of her scraggy teeth.

A Romance of the Rail.

A lady—maiden lady by choice—was travelling westward in the company of an elderly widower friend, who had been east making purchases, and gallantly volunteered to see the lady safely to her journey's end. The lady was forty, but looked much younger.

A sleeping section of a Pullman car had been secured for her, and a lower berth of the adjoining compartment for the gentleman. The day and evening had passed in delightful companionship, and about eleven o'clock they bade each other good night, and retired behind their curtains—she, to divest herself of outer garment, and replace the same by a loose wrapper, comfortable to sleep in, and still dressed in the event of accident. Then tying a handkerchief about her head to keep her "frizzes" from getting out of curl, she curled herself close to the back of the berth, and went to sleep.

The gentleman, on the contrary, could not woo slumber, so he got up, and, armed with a good cigar, went into the smoking-car to enjoy it and fraternize for the time being with some of his own sex. Our friend found a "good fellow," and two hours quickly passed away. A [illegible] bolt changed hands several times, and then the elderly widower returned to his car, kicked off his boots, and threw himself upon the [illegible] which he fancied was his berth, and fell into a profound slumber. How long the maiden lady had slept she did not know, but she was awakened by feeling the pressure of the bed clothes binding her in close quarters, and raising her head she observed her friend and protector, who was peacefully snoring a somnific lullaby which kept time to the roar and racket of the train. Happily, the mistake flashed upon the lady, and, taking in the situation, her first thought was to awaken him and get him out before the accident should have an observer. Trembling, yet bravely, she began to shake the intruder, and was rewarded by a muttered "Yes, yes, all right!"

"O, Mr. T., please—please wake up; you are in the wrong berth," she began to plead.

"Yes, yes; time enough—all right!"

She began to quake with anxiety and a possible unpleasant denouement, and, nerving herself, she reached out both hands and made a grab for his hair and beard.

"Good gracious!" was the wide-awake response, as the man sprang into a sitting position and faced his almost crying lady friend, whose appreciation of the ridiculous overcame her fright for the instant, as her woman's wit came to her aid, and, with a burst of laughter, she said:

"Mr. Pickwick, where's your night-cap?"

"My dear madame, a thousand pardons."

"Never mind; but go, for goodness sake! I know it's a mistake."

He sneaked away, feeling like a fool, and admiring the lady's good sense to such an extent that it will result in a wedding.

Moreau.

(Fortnightly Review.)

Upon August 27, 1813, there was fought at Dresden one of those tremendous battles which sufficiently proved Napoleon's unequaled mastery of the details by which great victories are won. The French Army, 130,000 strong, had to encounter an allied force of 160,000 men; but the allied left, composed of Austrian troops, was separated by a precipitous defile from the main body. Instantly profiting by the mistake, Napoleon sent Murat to attack the Austrian left, which he turned, and burst with his irresistible cavalry, 12,000 strong, upon the rear. The rout was complete, and then Napoleon addressed himself to the Russian right, which he drove back upon its reserve. At this moment Moreau, conspicuous in front of a Russian division, was struck on the right knee by a cannon shot, which, passing through his horse, shattered his left leg also. Both legs were amputated, but mortification set in, and five days later he died. His embalmed body was carried to St. Petersburg, and buried with great pomp in the Catholic Church. His widow received a lump sum of £20,000, and a Russian pension of £1,200 a year; nor was there any dissent among his contemporaries from the opinion confirmed by the subsequent judgment of posterity—that France, however rich in great Generals, had produced few abler fighting soldiers than Jean Victor Moreau. Marmont indeed proclaims with truth that "Moreau knew nothing of strategy. His skill displayed itself in tactics. Personally brave to a fault, he handled well, in presence of the enemy, troops occupying ground within the limits of his vision; but he delivered his principal battles with only a portion of his force." Such was also the verdict of Jomini; but the campaign of 1796, the passage of the Rhine in face of the enemy in 1797, and the battles of Biberach and of Hohenlinden are sufficient to place Moreau on a very high pedestal. With all his falsifications of history at St. Helena, Napoleon could not deny that Moreau—whom he hated for many reasons, but especially because Moreau was bitterly opposed to the creation of the Legion of Honor, which he turned into ridicule—had no superior among his Generals except Massena, Dessaix, and Kleber, of whom the last two fell early in the wars of that convulsive period. Subsequent writers of all countries have ranked Moreau as inferior in the field to Napoleon alone. When Massena met Wellington, and had to recoil from before the impregnable lines of Torres Vedras, the weight of years, acting upon a constitution naturally feeble and impaired by war, had begun to tell upon the French General, and, without detracting for a moment from Wellington's transcendant merits, Englishmen may, perhaps, be permitted to rejoice that their great commander had not, with far inferior strength, to face Moreau as Generalissimo in Spain, with Jomini as his chief of staff, instead of Massena, Marmont, Soult, and King Joseph, acting separately. Indeed, Moreau and Jomini, serving thus together, would have been as formidable a pair as Blucher and Gneisenau.

The Fortifications of Paris.

It was said in Louis Philippe's times that the fortifications of Paris were rather made to quell disturbance within than to offer resistance to enemies without. We all know that since 1870 great enlargements and modifications have been made in these fortifications. Why Paris should require fortifications at all has often been questioned. But Paris differs from all other capitals of the world, for Paris is France. Centralization has existed through so many centuries that once Paris falls the mot d'orde for all France is wanting. M. Tenot, who has just written a most interesting study on the fortifications of Paris, commenting on this necessity of making Paris impregnable, says: "The importance of Paris results from historic forces which are irresitab-e. Contemporaneous France did not create it, but is oblged to make the best of it." In 1840 the exped ency of M. Thier's fortifications were questioned, but as the Saturday Review has it, "the utility of fortifying the place received a practical answer in 1870." If not for at least the temporary check the Germans received before Paris, and the necessity they felt of reducing it, they would "have swept all over the land in irresistable power. The wisdom of M. Thiers becomes quite evident, then, and that latter criticism which declines to give this statesman thd merit of being sound on military topics is fairly refuted. Formerly, the forts were situated some two thousand to three thousand yards away from the bastioned enceinte. To-day, artillery has so much greater precision with increased range that the outer circle has been moved back a distance of from 8,000 to 18,000 yards. "The important advantage gained is that it would require an army three times more numerous than the Germans brought up against Paris in 1870 to shut the city in now, as they did before." With a necessity on the part of the besiegers to cover more ground comes the advantage to the besieged of concentrating attacks by sorties on particular points. In the larger forts there are 60 new rifled steel pieces, with a range of 8,000 yards. The whole of the exterior forts and batteries can be held by 20,000 men. A German critic, who has been looking at the defences, gives the following opinion: "On the whole, then, we consider that five or six forts must be taken and three or four silenced before an efficacious bombardment of Paris could commence." The whole effort seems to have been on the part of the new French engineers in charge to remove the enemy so far as to preclude the chance of placing batteries near enough to affect Paris. In increasing the circle, which is not large enough from a main centre to prevent it being armed and fought, it necessarily augments in much larger proportion the line of attack on the part of the enemy. They must invest a circle of 100 miles, whereas in 1870 50 was the limit. The army necessary to defend Paris would be 80,000 regulars and 120,000 "territorials," but from the forces in the field no extra soldier would be drawn. It is supposed that if an enemy could bring together 20 army corps of 30,000 men each, he might succeed in establishing a blockade, but then before he could reach that stage Epinal, Belfort, Langres, Besancon, and many other strong places recently fortified would have to be carried. What has been done once may be done again, but very certainly the nut which was cracked by Moltke in 1870 will present greater difficulties when the next gigantic struggle takes place.

In California the males formerly outnumbered the females very largely, but this disproportion has been gradually decreasing, and now the disparity is comparatively small. According to the last census, the population of the State, exclusive of Chinese, who are nearly all men, is 789,686, of which number 443,271 are males and 346,415 females.

A liveryman thinks the great want of the day is young men with three arms. He vaguely says it would lessen the number of sleighing accidents, but no one seems to understand his meaning.

The names of towns and settlements in Arizona possess the merit of originality. Here are some of them: Tombstone, Good Enough, Tough Nut, Contention, Family Fuss, and Discipline.

Recollections of an Equestrian Manager.

RAREY THE HORSE TAMER.

Every one remembers the advent of Rarey to England, and the perfect furor created by his wonderful feats at horse-taming. It may surprise many to learn that before he came out in this character, Rarey had had previous experience with horses, and that the lad gained the foundation of his great power over the horse by closely studying the methods that have from time immemorial been constantly practised by the circus trainer. Nevertheless, the power which he exercised over the wildest and most stubborn horses struck every beholder with wonder. Animals which on account of their furious temper had been given up by trainers and grooms as hopeless, were speedily rendered amenable to reason by his subtle treatment. The fortiter in re always gave place to the suaviter in modo. Rarey never feared a horse, and never gave the animal grounds for supposing that such a sentiment was possible. Introduced into his presence, sometimes at the risk of those who did so, the horse-trainer soon established a friendly footing with his dangerous equine companion. Bidding the astonished grooms leave the animal and himself to their own company, Rarey calmly surveyed his patient, and proceeded to coax and wheedle and stroke first the head, then the neck, and finally the forequarters, until he had in a measure allayed the fears and softened the ire of the animal. This, he termed "gentling." Next, by a series of quietly executed manceuvres—one of which was the strapping up of the forefeet—the biped had the quadruped lying helpless at his feet, subdued and docile enough to permit of the man reclining at full length upon the prostrate horse! After a while the straps were removed, and upon the animal regaining his feet, Rarey would quietly mount and ride him out of the inclosure.

The point of chief importance in the management of a horse is to study his humours and whims; not with the idea of actually giving way to them, but in order to attain the desired end through them. The trainer must not play a hectoring part, he must "stoop to conquer." Every horse of spirit is nervous at strange noises and strange sights; and equally so at having articles to which he is unaccustomed placed upon his back or neck or head. Let him see all that is going on. Take him into your confidence. If he is about to be bridled for the first time, the way not to do it is to hold him by the forelock and mane, while you vainly endeavour to force the strange thing over his head. The way to do it, is not to seem anxious to do it at all; let the horse see the bridle, and sniff at it; let him know that there is not much harm in it. He will then let you quietly put the apparatus over his head without fear or resistance.

A peculiar method is requisite to make a horse lie down, more particularly if you are a stranger to him. Having accustomed the horse to your presence, having fed him from your hand, and stroked and caressed and 'gentled' him, he will look upon you as a friend and be ready to obey you. A series of little taps upon one foreleg, and he is down upon one knee; the other knee is made to follow. In this position, the horse will submit to be gently rolled over on to his side, almost as though in a trance. Let each act be gentle and he is content. Once the horse is down, he becomes your slave; and this first victory may be best confirmed and subsequent lessons rendered less troublesome, by feeding him with some choice morsel while he is down; or if he will not eat in that position, directly he arises. Do not let your victory have in it any sting of defeat for him. The nearer that the trainer approaches the spirit thus indicated, the more successful he will be; and if he wanders too far from it, he will achieve no success at all.

Some years ago, General Airey in the course of a conversation with me, most fully endorsed the above views as to the great power of mingled firmness and kindness alone, without a knowledge of horses' temperaments, without great tact and insight into their individual characters, will be of little if any service with extremely stubborn and fractious animals. A proof of this was given by Rarey before General Airey's own eyes. These two gentlemen happened to meet at Mason's livery-stables, and a discussion was raised respecting the powers of the American tamer. The General did not believe that Rarey was gifted with any such power; he was of opinion that if a horse was beyond the influence of combined firmness and kindness, he was beyond our influence altogether. There was in Mason's stables an utterly intractable steed, well known to General Airey, which had never yet been harnessed; or if harnessed, had resisted all efforts to drive him. He was an irreconcilable. The General said that if Rarey had any special power, he would be able to bring it to bear upon this horse. Rarey at once undertook that he would unaided harness the horse, hitch him to a brake, and drive him up and down Piccadily. The challenge was accepted; the General frankly reiterating his full conviction that neither Rarey nor any one else could do it. But in an incredibly short time Rarey emerged from the stable with the horse harnessed as he had promised, and drove him as quietly as a lamb up and down Piccadilly.

THE REMALKABLE MEMORY OF HORSES.

It scarcely needs stating that a good memory is indispensable in learning anything. And if a horse has to learn a trick or routine performance, he can only do so by remembering it from time to time of going through it. Both horses and dogs have wonderful memories; but I will narrate one or two instances relating to the horse.

I was once driving to Long-Milford in Suffolk at a spot where there was a bridge leading over a river. As we appoached the bridge, the horse pulled up, and would not move on again without whipping. For some time I was at a loss to account for this freak; but it afterwards occurred to me that the last time I had crossed that bridge and with the same horse, I had pulled up at that very spot to speak to a man I had met.

Unless there is a reason to the contrary we always prefer occupying the same field each time we visit a town. Sometimes it happens that the stud-groom, who is generally with the first wagon, forgets which field it is. But by giving the horse his head and leaving him to himself, he will most certainly pull up at the right gate. The groom never finds him to be wrong, and drives straight in.

When in Southampton some years since, I had to pass up High street daily, and had a different horse almost every day. Whichever horse I had, he would slacken speed at the Star Hotel and want to turn into the yard. Upon mentioning this to the stud-groom, he explained that five years previously, when the circus was in Southampton, the stud had been stabled at the Star, and the horses had not forgotten the place again.

THEIR REMARKABLE INTELLIGENCE.

I have my opinion, founded upon close and varied observation, that horses can and do convey to each other very exact intelligence by the various sounds they produce, from the proud, sonorous neighings of a full-spirited horse, down to the whinnyings and snortings and other little sounds with which all keepers of horses are familiar. Once, in a long stable containing twenty stalls in a row, a horse at the one end was dying. Near the other end was a horse of a timid disposition, which shewed marked signs of dread and extreme nervousness, as though conscious of what was going on; trembling from head to foot, and streaming with perspiration. I feel convinced that intelligence of what was passing had reached this horse, and that being of a nervous temperament, the poor animal had been troubled to the painful extent we had witnessed.

Another example of a different kind. It often happened that I was away from the Company for weeks and months at a stretch; and on some of these occasions I had to return along the road by which the circus was coming, thus meeting the vans one after the other all down the line. When yet there was some distance between myself and the nearest van, my horse would scent or see the lead van-horse and salute him with a loud neigh. This would be at once answered by the van-horse, which seemed to pass the signal to the rear down the line, where it was taken up from horse to horse to the very end, perhaps three-quarters of a mile away. Then as I rapidly drove by and met the vans, each horse would turn towards mine as he passed, greeting him with a friendly and joyous neigh; apparently holding a short conversation in passing, as though welcoming each other after a separation. For it must be noted that it was only after long absence that such demonstrations took place.

HOW TO WATER A HORSE.

On the question of giving a horse water, when to do it and when not, much popular ignorance exists. Every one knows that, "while one man can take a horse to the water, twenty can't make him drink." But every one does not stop to think that it is because he is not thirsty that he will not drink. Now, if a horse is given an unlimited supply of water after a long dry run, he drinks heartily, and then danger [illegible] from [illegible]. The proper method is to let the horse cool down before he drinks. That is very good as far as it goes; but [illegible] tion would be far better. When a horse is doing a long distance, offer him water frequently—as frequently as possible without inconvenience. He will either sip a mouthful or so, or none at all. The instincts of the horse serve this case, and as reason in men. Let the horse use his instincts freely, and as a rule he will never indulge to his own injury.

SENSITIVE TASTE AND SMELL OF THE HORSE.

Horses have a quick sense and delicate palate. The least impurity in the water or in the vessel that contains it, will frequently cause the horse to refuse it. A curious incident bearing upon this point happened some years ago when a London distiller was suspected of conveying a large quantity of spirits off his premises without paying duty. An excise officer had his attention drawn to a horse-trough which was so situated that it might have been possible to run the spirits through it and away in some manner underground, in the night. But professional evidence was adduced to prove that, had such been the practice, horses would never have drunk out of it as they did; for the odour of the strong raw spirits would have clung to the trough and tainted the water.

Here is an illustration of the natural instinct of the horse when guided by his sense of smell. One of our men had bought or had been given the skin of a lion which had recently died; and as the circus was just leaving the town, he threw it on to the driver's seat of one of the vans, to have it tanned at the next town. The horse in that van was a very quiet one, that had been with the circus for years. Nevertheless, the animal immediately showed signs of fear, which increased in spite of all endeavours to pacify him. Then, breaking loose from all restraint, he kicked and reared and plunged about in the wildest manner until he had broken the harness and escaped. Various conjectures might be made as to the manner in which the horse's fears were aroused; but I think it probable that all those creatures which are liable to become the prey of carnivorous beasts, have been endowed by nature with an instinct which enables them to distinguish their foes from other animals.

Kings and Kingdoms.

ODD FACTS ABOUT THE RULERS OF THE EARTH AND THEIR TERRITORIES FROM THE "GOTHA."

[New York World.]

Very interesting reading indeed an appreciative student can find between the two scarlet covers of Herr Justus Perthes' "Almanach de Gotha" for 1881, the hundred and eighteen year of its publication. For all that may be said "among our fierce democracy" as to kings and nobles, and without for a moment pretending to contend that our Americans are like the immortal "Tommy" and "dearly love a lord," the fact remains that personal gossip and statistics concerning those who in the nature of things are removed from the sphere of daily and commonplace life are always acceptable—often fascinating. And a very pleasant companion Herr Justus Perthes is for a jaunt among the imperial, royal, princely, and noble families of Europe, though we have sometimes to complain that, in his easily-to-be-accouted-for discretion, he omits to mention enjoyable facts which do not exactly "consist" with the dignity of his distinguished subjects. For instance, we are not told that the empress of Austria's brother Prince Charles Theodore of Bavaria, is a diplomaed doctor, and a very good one, too; nor, that the Landgravine Marie Alexandria Augustine Louis Eugenie Martilda, duchess of Wurtemberg, royal highness, and widow of the Landgrave Charles of Hesse-Philippsthel, went through the bankruptey court, last year, like the most piebeian of land-ladies or milliners. Under the head "Russia" there is no mention of the beautiful Princess Dolgorousi, and from the list of the male members of the house of Reuss—all of whom are Henries, and are numbered in the order of their birth, a new series beginning with a new century—we at last miss the name of Prince Henry XX., who married a circus-rider, Mlle. Clotilde Loisset, and was compelled to sacrifice his princely rank, become plain Baron von Reichenfels, and emigrate to Bulgaria to become aid to his old comrade, Prince Alexander I. Under the title "Wurtemberg," too, we miss the name of the Princess Pauline, a self-willed woman of 26, who on May day last year renounced her title and position, became plain Fraulein von Kirback, and married Dr. Willim, of Breslau, a young physician who passed his examination on the eve of his marriage, and apparently obtained a good wife, since, when the court preacher at the altar dwelt with disparaging flattery on her sacrifice, the ex-princess interrupted him with the remark that she was only too glad to give up all to obtain the man she loved. The princess is distantly related to the Princess Victoria, the future empress of Germany. More by token, this latter princess' aunt (sister-in-law to the Princess Helena of England, married another physician, Dr. Esmarch, of Kiel, while this last lady's uncle married as his second wife, in 1864, Miss Lee, of New York. The roll of the house of Hatzfeldt, too, is now illumined by the name of the young prince who married another circus-rider, Mlle. Emilie Loisset; still another equestrienne's name is lacking from the "Gotha"—the ex-princess of Salm-Salm. Whether circus-riders or gardeners' daughters rank lowest in the opinion of the editor cannobe said, but he certainly scorns to mention the union of the head of the house of Erbach-Erbach with Fraulein Luck though he records the morganatic marriages of his two sons. This family traces its descent from Charlemagne's daughter Emma, or Imma, and his secretary and biographer, Eginhard, whom, as readers of Longfellow remember, the princess carried from her bower pick-a-back, lest the print of his footsteps on the snow should betray their loves. The value of this story is impaired by the fact that Charlemagne had no daughter Emma, so far as is known; that his daughters generally were "a bad lot," that Eginhard says none of them ever married, and that the episode of the snow-storm had been told of Henry the Black more than two centuries before it was told of Eginhard.

How much of pathos and tragedy some of these closely-printed pages contain! One name alone appears in the first section under the title "Maison Bonaparte—Ligne Imperiale de France," that of the ex-empress Eugenie, widowed, childless, and motherless, though twice that family has occupied the proudest position in the book established before Napoleon Bonaparte was born. The ex-empress has played a more heroic part than did the wife of Napoleon I. Metternich has told us how Maria Louisa, when the conqueror asked her in marriage, desired her father to dispose of her without any regard to her personal preferences, but solely with an eye to the interests of the empire. He has also told us that Napoleon was a remarkably good husband to her, forbearing to vex her as he had incessantly vexed Josephine. But Sismondi has preserved the letter which the empress wrote in the midst of the agony of the hundred days, hoping fervently that Count Neipperg had not broken his poor dear leg; this same Count Neipperg she subsequently married, and their son is alive, the head of the inconspicuous house of Montenuovo. The second section of the Bonaparte notice is devoted to the Jeromist branch—"Plon-Plon's" wife by the way, was the "Iphigenia of Italy," ever as Maria Louisa was the Iphigenia of Austria—but in law, religion, and justice it should contain the names of the descendents of Betsey Patterson. Just across the page comes the family of Bourbon. What thrones remain to them after more than two centuries of planning, plotting, conquering, and marrying. Denmark and Saxe-Coburg-Gotha unquestionably hold the first place in Europe at the present through their alliances. Christian IX. twenty years ago was leading the life of a retired country gentleman in Denmark with a comparatively limited income. One of his daughters will be Queen of England, another empress of Russia, and a third would be queen of Hanover but for Bismarck, while the fourth child has ascended the throne of Greece. One prince of the house of Saxe-Coburg married the queen of England, and another the queen of Portugal; a prince of that house sits on the throne of Belgium; his sister was for a brief and perilous period empress of Mexico; and so on down a long list.

A glance at the table of ages and reigns will rather surprise the average reader, whose preconceived ideas on the subject of history are generally of the hazist and most inaccurate sort. No one will be astonished to learn that the evergreen emperor of Germany, now nearly 84 years old, is the oldest of living sovereigns, the next in point of age [illegible] April 25, 1808; Leo XIII, born March 2, 1810; the king of the Netherlands, born Feb. 19, 1817, and Prince Adolph, of Schaumbourg-Lippe, born on the 1st of August in the same year. The King of Denmark is sixth on the list; the Czar, seventh; Queen Victoria, eleventh; Dom Pedro of Brazil, sixteenth, and the emperor of Austria, twenty-fourth, the two sovereigns under thirty being Prince Milan, of Siberia, born Aug. 18, 1854, and King Alfonso XII, of Spain, born Nov. 28, 1857, who in his short life has assisted at two revolutions, has been married twice and shot at twice. But the positions are materially changed when we come to regard the length of each ruler's reign. Dom Pedro, of Brazil, heads the list, having ascended the throne April 7, 1831, at the age of six; the duke of Brunswick (April 20, 1831), comes next; Queen Victoria is third—June 20, 1837; Francis Joseph of Austria is sixth—December 2, 1848; the king of the Netherlands seventh—March 11, 1849; the czar is twelfth, and the Emperor William (as king of Prussia) only nineteenth. King George of the Hellenes ascended the throne more than five months before his father assumed the royal dignity. The junior sovereign is Charles, prince of Schwarzburg-Sonderschausen, who, though a man of fifty, only began to reign on the 17th of July last.

Upon the list of orders there are inscribed 158 different orders, some of which contain several classes, while 24 other decorations are mentioned conferred by dethroned sovereigns or no longer recognized by the countries to which they are attributed. France has a single order—the Legion of Honour—Austria has 9, Bavaria 13, Spain 13, Prussia 12, and Russia 8. Six orders went out with the kingdom of the two Sicilies; three with the downfall of Maximilian—those of our Lady of Guadeloupe, the Mexican Eagle and St. Charles, and one with the overthrow of Lopez, the tyrant of Paraguay. Republican orders are not uncommon—apart from the Cross of the Legion of Honour, a strict republican might accept the order of Santa Rosa of Honduras; the order of Chivalry of San Marino, the order of San Juan of Nicaragua, or the Medal of the bust of Bolivar, of Venezuela. The ladies cannot complain that no stars and crosses are provided for their gentle breasts, since to them are allotted the Starry cross, of Austria; the Bavarian cross of Merit and orders of St. Elizabeth, of Theresa, of St. Anne, of Munich, and of St. Anne, of Wurzburg; the cross of the Legion of Honour; the Victoria and Albert, Crown of Indian and cross of St. Katherine, of England; the Grand cross (only) of the Order of the crown of the Wends, of Mecklenburg; a Persian order—not named; the Order of St. Isabella, of Portugal; the Prussian Order of Louisa and Cross of Merit; the Order of St. Catharine, of Russia; the Order of Sidonia, of Saxony; and the Order of Olga, of Wurtemberg.

Among the states enumerated in the second part of the book some deserve a passing notice. There is the republic of Andorra, for instance, with a population variously estimated at from four to eighteen thousand—where, by the way, they tried to get up a revolution the other day. It has for its suzerains the "godless" republic of France and the Catholic Bishop of Urgel, who divide the nomination of the judicial authorities, and receive as tribute annually the sums respectively, of $192 and $178.20. The parishes, or rather four heads of families in each parish, elect the council, from which the syndic is chosen. By the way, during four months of the year the Bishop of Urgel is Pope of Andorra, and nominates to ecclesiastical offices without asking the sanction of Leo XIII. Andorra offers rare facilities for the establishment of another foreign mission. Bolivia presents the interesting spectacle of a standing army composed of 8 generals, 359 officers of high rank, 654 superior officers, and 2,000 men. Hayti, the statistician says, cautiously, "has an outrageously large number of generals," and a fleet of two ships—on the stocks; the late pope had a fleet of one vessel, but Leo XIII, abolished the papal navy, we believe, from motives or economy. Under the head of Lichtenstein we find no notice of the fact that that gallant little principality with its population of 9,124 souls is still at war with the German empire! It is, for when Prussia and Austria made peace in 1866, they forgot to include Lichtenstein in the treaty, and hence Prince John II,—the enumeration of his royal family takes up nearly three pages of the Almanach de Gotha—has been left to wage war single-handed against the Kaiser, Bismarck, and Moltke for nearly fifteen years. Monaca has an army of nine officers and sixty-three men, and may be expected to offer a desperate resistance when France—as she soon will—gobbles up the principality whose gambling hells now put such immense sums into the pockets of Prince Roland Bonaparte, the husband of Mlle. Blanc. The little republic of San Marino is better prepared to resist any attack on its independence by Italy, since with only 7,816 inhabitants it has an army of 950 men, including 131 officers. How many rosiers would offhand class Samos with Bulgaria—and, indeed, with Egypt—as a tributary principality of Turkey? And finally, what a standing army Uruguay has! It originally contained 2,190 men, but having been reduced by a regiment of cavalry and a battalion of infantry, if can not now number more than 1,625 soldiers of all arms, who will be led to victory when necessary by 2 brigadiers, 8 generals, 59 colonels, 83 lieutenant colonels, and 1,000 other officers.

Wealth and Meanness.

JOAQUIN MILLER IN CALIFORNIA.

I tell you that, in nine cases out of ten great acquired wealth lifts up in monumental testimony the meanness of its possessor. I know two neighbors, old Californians, who had about equal fortunes. They were both old settlers, both rich and respected. In that fearful year, 1859, when the dying and destitute immigrants literally crawled on hands and knees over the Sierra trying to reach the settlements, one of these men drove all his cattle up to the mountains, butchered them, and fed the starving. He and his Mexicans pack all the mules with flour, which at that time cost almost its weight in gold, and push one night and day over the mountains to reach the strangers there and feed them, so that they might have strength to reach his house where they could have shelter and rest. The other man cold and cautious, saw his opportunity and embraced it. He sat at home and sold all his wheat and mules and meat, and with the vast opportunities for turning money into account in that new country soon became almost a prince in fortune. But his generous neighbour died a beggar in Idaho, where he had gone to try to make another fortune. He literally had not money enough to buy a shroud; and as he died among strangers, by the roadside, he was buried without even so much as a pine board coffin. I saw his grave there only last year. Some one had set up a rough granite stone at the head, and that was all. No name not even a letter or a date. Nothing. But that bowlder was fashioned by the hand of Almighty God, and in the little seams and dots and mossy scars that cover it he can read the that chronicle the secret virtues of this lone dead man on the snowy mountains of Idaho. The children of the prince are in Paris. Upheld by his collossal wealth, their lives seem to embrace the universal world. He is my friend. He buys all my books and reads every line I write. When he comes to this sketch he will understand it. And he ought to understand, too, that all the respect, admiration and love which the new land once gave these two men gathers around and is buried beneath that moss-grown granite stone; and that I know, even with all his show of splendor, that his heart is as cold and as empty as the dead man's hand.

How We Abuse Our Horses.

If we say that of all brute animals none is more valuable to man than the horse, and that the neglect of any means which may promote his welfare and efficiency is a blunder not easily distinguishable from crime, we may fairly be charged with uttering truisms. If we urge that this value is not recognized as it should be, and that this neglect is miserably common, we may still be accused of wasting breath on statements which no one would think of calling into question. Every one, we may be told, is well aware that the management of horses is very faulty, that their lives are shortened by the ignorance of those who have charge of them rather than by any wanton cruelty, and they are rendered practically useless long before their existence is brought to an end. To the plea that the same, or much the same, things may be said of men as of horses, we may answer that the blame must be apportioned to the degree of confidence with which evils affecting either men or horses are allowed to go unchecked, or are fearfully dealt with; nor can failure to improve the condition of mankind form a reason for refusing to do what may improve the condition of horses.

[illegible]

The fact has been figured out that the world owes about $30,000,000,000 and is manifestly unable to pay its debts. The world would evidently be in a bad fix if its creditors were residents of another planet and should commence proceedings to close up accounts. But whatever the world owes, it owes itself. It is like a nation which owes a large debt to its own people. A failure to pay its debts will not diminish the amount of wealth in the nation. Debt-creating is a process by which the accumulations of the wealthier classes are concentrated in one fund on the promise that interest shall be paid for the money thus taken charge of until the principal is returned. The individual bondholder of a nation whose credit is good can get his coin whenever he wants it by selling his bond; but if the time should ever come when the mass of bondholders wanted to sell, bonds would go down to zero. Government then will have been the agent by which the surplus wealth of the classes that have something was distributed. Who gets the money so distributed it is hard to say. In some cases the bondholders get a portion of it in their dealings with the Government contractors, officeholders, and the various capacities in which the Government is served. Military and naval nations distribute large sums in paying the common soldiers of their arms and navies, and the workman who manufacture arms, the farmers who furnish provisions and other material for the use of either branch of the service. That a time will come when the debts thus accumulated will be wiped out by some other process than payment is apparently an assured fact. The bulk of the world's indebtedness was created within eighty years. The European nations most heavily loaded with debt in 1880 had no debt of any consequence in 1800. Within these 80 years a debt has been piled up which calls for one-third of their annual revenue. Of course taxes must be increased to meet this additional expense. If taxes fail more debt is created. Occasional payments made in prosperous and peaceful years do not materially affect the ratio of increase during a long period of time. The astonishing feature of this debt-creating business is, that the power to increase debt seems in proportion to the debt already incurred. France owes some $4,700,000,000, the annual interest of which is $203,000,000; yet France could add another thousand million to its debt now more easily than it could have borrowed the amount of its present interest when it had no interest to pay. England owes $4,000,000 and if a threat of war should occasion a demand for a few hundred millions more, the value of the present debt would not be materially impaired. These debts could not have been created if there had not been people in the world who had money to spare, and could not be materially increased if there were not some people in a similiar financial condition. The loss of a force liquidation, if ever made, will fall on the class that has accumulated wealth, rather than on the class which has hard work to make a living.

EMINENT FOLK.

LADY LISGAR, widow of the late Governor-General of Canada, is among the Boycotted.

THE Queen of Portugal is a lover of art, and has given a large sum towards the completion of the Duomo at Florence.

SEVEN hundred thousand women in France and Italy are employed in the manufacture of raw silk from the cocoon.

MR. BRADLAUGH continues his attacks on the British Pension list, which later in the session will probably be heard a good deal about.

IN reference to the marriage of Lady Burdett-Coutts, a London paper thinks it necessary to state that should there be issue (the bride is 66) the eldest son will inherit the title, but he and the other children will bear the name of the father.

EMPEROR WILLIAM is now growing thin in his body, and his legs have diminished in rotundity; his military coats are thickly padded, and his trousers are cut very large. The old man's strength is evidently failing, but he boasts that he is as active as ever.

THE Princess Louise will return to her husband in May, and the two will join a large party of English visitors in a fishing excursion on the lower St. Lawrence. The princess will then, with her English guests, visit Manitoba and the northwest provinces of the Dominion.

COUNT CARLO MENABREA, son of the Italian ambassador in London, and one of King Humbert's masters of ceremonies, has just tried to prove that men may die and worms may eat them for love. He was disappointed in his young affections, and thereupon shot himself in the face with his revolver. But he only succeeded in disfiguring, not in killing himself.

PRINCE BISMARCK has appeared in Berlin so much better in health that he seems to have taken a new lease in life. His complexion has lost its sickly pallor, and he seems in excellent spirits. Scarcely a day passes without a conference between the emperor and the prime minister, whose burly figure is often seen by the pedestrian through the lace curtains of the imperial study as he bends in explanation or inquiry over the writing-table.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

"No, no," said the manager, "she'll never make a star, though she is pretty and talented. Why, she hasn't got mad and refused to play since I've employed her. She won't fight her husband, and when I advised her to thrash an editor she seemed shocked. There's not the making of a Bernhardt, or an Oates even, in her."

Edwin Booth at Home.

Very youthful in appearance, in fact almost in proportion as young-looking as Mr. Hare, whose resemblance to him is remarkable, Mr. Booth is yet in his tenth lustre; but, allowance being made for nervous wear and tear, is, in manner, gait, and speech, a young man. He may be taken, indeed, as an illustration of Mrs. Kealy's theory, that acting is a very healthy profession. Smoking incessantly when not on the stage, Mr. Booth is otherwise the most abstemious of men. On the ground that his nervous temperament will not bear the excitement of stimulants, he drinks nothing stronger than tea, and eschews dinners and diners, junketings and frolics, of all and every kind. A member of any number of clubs, he never goes near one of them, and lives entirely at his movable home. Once in a while he may dine, on a Sunday, with pleasant friends; but such occasions are few and far between, and his daily routine of life is of the most modest and quiet kind. In defiance of the prevailing fashion of living in the open air, he never goes out except under compulsion. Rising late, he is content to pass his day over a book, struggling against the depression which follows the excitement of appearing on the stage, and only recovers himself as the hour for action approaches. It was once asked at what precise hour Mr. Macready "began to be Macbeth." In the case of Mr. Booth the hour is variable, depending very much on when reaction sets in. When he has done his work he goes home, not like Mr. Toole, "to his tea," but to what Americans call "a bite of supper," followed by a prolonged interview with a very fine meerschaum, a gossip with his wife, and a spell at a book by his fireside. He is one more instance of the quiet home-loving instincts of men who are imagined by the good-natured public to lead lives of gayety and splendour—the centres of admiring crowds of worshippers, the pierres de touche of such raconteurs, wits, and humorists as are still left to us.

A Cunning Cat.

(From the Carson Appeal.)

A gentleman who took a trip into the country yesterday, when on the plains, a mile from any house, noticed a cat, a huge one, almost as large as a fair-sized dog. It was lying upon the ground, its feet uppermost, in such a way that he had no doubt that it had fallen a victim to some vicious dog. Around it, feeding unsuspectingly, was a flock of small birds. The apparently lifeless cat was within range of the vision of the observer for some time, and just as he was thinking how much easier it would be for the animal to feign death and catch a bird by deceiving it than by slipping up to it, he was astonished to see the cat suddenly roll over and grab one of the feathered tribe that was very near. The other birds flew away a hundred yards or so and alighted. The cat only made one or two mouthfuls of the game, and then crept around to the windward of the birds, laid itself out again, and once more successfully played the dead dodge. The gentleman drove away wondering how many birds it took to satisfy the feline's appetite.

A victim of youthful imprudence causing Premature Decay, Nervous Debility, Lost Manhood, etc., having tried in vain every known remedy, has discovered a simple self cure, which he will send FREE to his fellow-sufferers, address J. H. REEVES, 43 Chatham St., N. Y.

Cathartic Pills

Combine the choicest cathartic principles in medicine, in proportions accurately adjusted to secure activity, certainty, and uniformity of effect. They are the result of years of careful study and practical experiment, and are the most effectual remedy yet discovered for diseases caused by derangement of the stomach, liver, and bowels, which require prompt and effectual treatment. AYER'S PILLS are specially applicable to this class of diseases. They act directly on the digestive and assimilative processes, and restore regular healthy action. Their extensive use by physicians in their practice, and by all civilized nations, is one of the many proofs of their value as a safe, sure, and perfectly reliable purgative medicine. Being compounded of the concentrated virtues of purely vegetable substances, they are positively free from calomel or any injurious properties, and can be administered to children with perfect safety.

AYER'S PILLS are an effectual cure for Constipation or Costiveness, Indigestion, Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Foul Stomach and Breath, Dizziness, Headache, Loss of Memory, Numbness, Biliousness, Jaundice, Rheumatism, Eruptions and Skin Diseases, Dropsy, Tumors, Worms, Neuralgia, Colic, Gripes, Diarrhœa, Dysentery, Gout, Piles, Disorders of the Liver, and all other diseases resulting from a disordered state of the digestive apparatus.

As a Dinner Pill they have no equal.

While gentle in their action, these PILLS are the most thorough and searching cathartic that can be employed, and never give pain unless the bowels are inflamed, and then their influence is healing. They stimulate the appetite and digestive organs; they operate to purify and enrich the blood, and impart renewed health and vigor to the whole system.

SEVENTY-NINE MONKEYS BURNED TO DEATH.—A fire which cost no less than seventy-nine lives (fortunately not human lives, but those of a valuable collection of monkeys) has just taken place in the Antwerp Zoological Gardens. It appears that an accident occurred to one of the flues late at night; some hay caught fire, and the place was in flames before the alarm was given and assistance could arrive to rescue the poor monkeys from their cruel fate. When the poor animals perceived their danger they must have made frantic efforts to get loose, for the iron bars are said to have been bent in their attempts to escape. Had the fire been perceived a little sooner the whole collection might have been saved.

Henry Stull became seriously involved in St. Louis through his boastfulness. While drunk, late at night, he entered a barroom and declared that he had just killed a man. "I'm harmless as a turtle dove when let alone," said he, "but when they crowd me I'm a terror. Three men attached me in the street, and I killed one with a knife. You'll see it all in the papers to-morrow." He showed the knife, washed it and his hands carefully, and made all the men and women in the place promise solemnly not to betray him. His story was pure fiction; but it happened that a man had been stabbed to death in the same neighbourhood. Stull was arrested, and it was with difficulty that he proved his innocence.

ALGERIA is beginning to develop a taste for the fine arts. Not long ago the success of the exhibition at Algiers took every one by surprise, and now another, which has been organized at Oran, is equally successful. "The pictures sold," says an enthusiastic correspondent, "as if by enchantment."

England is being flooded with what are now called New York sovereigns. These are counterfeit coins made in America so perfectly as to have deceived the English experts for some time. They have exactly the same weight and diameter and give the proper ring, but are a little thicker than the true coin, which defect was only discovered when they were put up in rouleaux.

Boyhood.

No pallid winding sheet,
No coffin, and no dim
And narrow earthly grave
Were made by man for him.

And yet he is as dead
As any corpse that lies
Secreted from the light
Of the encircling skies.

Dead, many years ago!
His spirit passed away
So swiftly, silently,
I cannot tell the day.

I loved him passing well,
This boy, light-souled and fair,
Because he loved me so,
And bore the name I bear.

Doubt.

The waves are breaking on the beach,
And on the soft, wet sand I stand;
Far out as human sight can reach
The ocean stretches from the land.

What is it that ye seek to reach?
Cold, curling, crested waves, that roar
An uninterpretable speech
Along the endless, wreck-strewn shore?

"Oh, tell me that beyond the sea
A peaceful harbour lies!" I wail.
A mocking echo answers me,
"Lies! lies!" and I can see no sail.

Retrospection.

The gray-bearded man feels no pleasures
So dear as the joys he has lost.
As roses of summer seem sweeter
When viewed through a vista of frost.

CHAPTER IV. CONTINUED.

"I am glad you did, Cecil. Never let any trouble worry you that I can lighten."

The girl half moved away, then paused, came back, and put her arm in the most beseeching, coaxing way within his.

"Why do you stop in here all alone?" she said persuasively. "I'm sure you can't want to be busy every evening. What do you do?"

The Colonel laughed; he did very little now of an evening; he could not read or write when across the hall he could hear their merry chatter, their joyous laughter, or Cecil's piano. Not that these things disturbed or annoyed him, but they raised a thousand memories within him.

"I am obliged to confess, Cecil, that I do very little," he said; "but I always did spend the evening in the library. It had everything here that I wanted."

"Has it everything now?" said Cecil, archly.

"Just at this moment, yes," he answered quickly; but added directly, "Young people don't always care for the presence of their elders, Cecil; it causes restraint."

"Oh, no, no! Never with you!" interrupted Cecil eagerly. "Won't you come now and play?" she added coaxingly.

"If you really want me, my child."

"Thanks; how good of you!" And Cecil led Colonel McLeod captive to the drawing-room—a willing captive enough.

And so it was that another of the Colonel's solitary habits was given up, and his evenings were no longer passed in the library, unless he really had business to do; then Cecil would come and put her curly head in at the door and say in her witching way—

"When are you coming in, Colonel McLeod? The piano has been open this half-hour."

CHAPTER V.

It was a somewhat secluded life that the Verners led at Ridinghurst; for Colonel McLeod himself never went into the society that Hyde afforded, and indeed he had not more than a bowing acquaintance with the families around; so, of course, Cecil was never asked anywhere, especially as it was understood that she was not "out."

Wonder and gossip were rife in military circles. Mrs. Rhodes, the Major's wife, declared that no doubt Colonel McLeod did not care to bring Miss Verner into society. She supposed he was bringing her up for himself. She wondered if Miss Verner knew that story about Gherutpoor. She ought to be told. Captain Chalmers's sister, to whom she imparted her surmises, thought nothing of the kind, and hoped the Major's wife would do nothing indiscreet.

The idea was absurd, she said. Miss Verner was like a child. She had talked to her at the review a great deal, and had met her once or twice besides. She had seen her with the Colonel, and his manner was just what it should be to a girl more than twenty years younger than himself. And she was quite sure that Colonel McLeod would not marry now. "Little Miss Alice is the flirt," added Miss Chalmers, with a knowing nod. "Did you see her at the review with Fairleigh of 'ours'?"

"I think," remarked the Doctor's wife, who was calling on the Major's wife, "that Lord Kennedy is very much struck with Miss Verner. She is very beautiful, certainly, and a most interesting girl. It is certain that he goes to Ridinghurst more than any one else."

"But then he is fond of the Colonel," suggested Mrs. Rhodes.

"Oh, my dear lady, trust me, gentlemen don't find such charms in the society of their own sex as all that! It would be a very good match for Cecil Verner. I suppose the Chief will give them something on their marriage."

So gossip did not pass by the occupants of Ridinghurst. It was quite true that Lord Kennedy found his way to that mansion more often than was warranted by his affection for the Colonel. No one knew that better than Loris McLeod.

Well, he thought, Cecil was eighteen now, but she was very young to have a lover; yet many girls in the world were married at her age. Of course she would marry some day, and leave Ridinghurst. Why not? Besides, Lord Kennedy was very good and noble-hearted, and would love Cecil well. He would have no fear in trusting her to his care. Did Cecil care for him? Would she be happy in leaving Ridinghurst? And Lord Kennedy was in the prime of life, mused the Colonel, fitted in every way to make the girl happy. Yes, it would be a happy thing for her, for the bright-haired, soft-eyed child, who sang about the house like a lark, and always ran to meet him when he came home. Yes, he believed he would make her happy. Loris McLeod said this to himself over and over again, as he paced the library in the growing dusk of the short winter day, with his arms folded tightly over his breast, his lips compressed; and the old gloom, which she had chased from his brow, had gathered again. Presently he sank down upon a chair and bowed his head on his crossed arms. She was not for him to love and cherish, he thought bitterly. What had he to give her? A ruined, shattered life. Spotless and unstained must be the name he would offer. He had stretched out his hands to grasp honour and glory, and they had been swept away from him. His youth and his early manhood had passed away and left him loveless. Now love came to him too late, and that too must be crushed and hidden. It was another torture to bear, another victory to win.

There was a knock at the door. Colonel McLeod rose erect and calm. He could almost have anticipated the announcement the servant made—that Lord Kennedy asked to see Colonel McLeod if he were disengaged.

"Yes, I am not busy. Show him in here, Hester," said the Colonel quietly; and he pressed his hand for a moment to his heart, as though to try to still its throbbing. He knew, as if he had already been told, the object of the interview that Lord Kennedy desired.

Lord Kennedy came in with quick, alert step. He was a tall soldierly man, nearly ten years younger than the Colonel, with an open brow and bright earnest eyes—the very man to win a girl's love, Loris McLeod said inwardly. And a bitter pang pierced him, as he clasped the outstretched hand in silence.

"Sit down, Kennedy," said the Colonel to the young man. There was no change in his sweet musical voice and quiet reserved manner. "What fortunate chance, may I say, has brought you to Ridinghurst this afternoon?"

"No chance, Colonel," answered Lord Kennedy, with a smile. "I rode over from Stoneminster on purpose to talk with you. I wonder if you have any idea why I have come?"

Colonel McLeod drew back a little to where the shadow of the mantel-shelf fell upon his face. Then he said quietly—

"I might guess wrongly. You had better tell me, dear boy."

The young man rose, and rested his arm on the mantel-piece for a moment. He could never know all the agony that that man, so erect, so calm, so kind, was battling with in those few seconds.

"You must surely have seen," Lord Kennedy then said, looking into the fire, and speaking rather hurriedly at first, "that I have ventured to come more often to Ridinghurst during these last few months than I did before, Miss Verner came to live under your guardianship. Can you wonder that, gifted as she is with every attraction to win a man's love, I have dared to hope that she might learn to give me her heart? I know she is very young," the young man continued eagerly, as though to forestall objections that might be raised—"but surely not too young to understand the power she holds! I would not go to her before I spoke to you, because you have a right to know in what position I desire to stand. You will give your consent, McLeod, and let me win her if I can?"

He spoke earnestly and eagerly. He had a noble stainless name to offer, untarnished honour, a love without regrets, and a life unshadowed to give Cecil Verner.

"You have my consent to win Cecil if you can," answered Loris McLeod steadily. "There is no man I know to whom I would more readily trust her. If she loves you, she will be happy with you."

Lord Kennedy flushed crimson, and in silence stretched out his hand. It lay for a moment in the Colonel's close firm clasp—a clasp that meant much. His loyal heart knew no half-measures. Ungrungingly and without reserve, he was renouncing the prize that he might once have won. Yet he was thankful for the darkness, thakful that the bitterness of such self-renunciation could not be seen in his white lips, in the agony that shadowed his dark eyes.

"You have made me very happy!" said Lord Kennedy, after a moment. "Ah, I know what you would say! But, still, tell me if you think I have perhaps some place in ner heart."

"My dear boy, how can I tell?" said the Colonel, with a half smile. "Can I read a young girl's heart? How do I, twice her years, know what may have changed her from a child to a woman in a year, a month—ay, a moment?"

"But, frankly, do you think she has any idea that I come purposely to see her? Does she think of me as a possible lover?"

"Again I cannot say. Girls do not make confidents generally of their guardians; still, I don't imagine that Cecil's thoughts run much on lovers. But that is for you to find out."

"Ah, I feel so nervous when I think of asking that dear girl for her love!" said Lord Kennedy, looking down. "My heart fails me. She is too abrupt. And yet I cannot live like this, knowing nothing of my fate; and it would be very wrong to her."

There was silence for some moments. Loris McLeod was bracing himself for that ordeal that he knew must come. He read, as clearly as though it had been said in words, all that was passing in Lord Kennedy's mind. Oh, why was this last sacrifice asked of him whose heart was torn by so many wounds?

"McLeod," said Kennedy, raising his head, "you will think the request perhaps a strange one for me to make; but, ah, if you knew how I fear—if you would speak to Cecil—Miss Verner first—ask her if I may dare hope—you could——"

The Colonel moved somewhat restlessly. Nevertheless his voice and his manner were kind even to tenderness.

"Don't you think, dear boy, you can plead your own cause better than I could?" he said.

Then, as Lord Kennedy was silent, he turned away and walked slowly down the darkening room.

"Strange," he murmured, half smiling, "we men, who face death a thousand times without the quiver of a nerve, tremble before the thought of a look from a woman's eyes!"

He came back to the place where the young man stood, and then resumed his former position. Lord Kennedy looked up questionably.

"You must think me a coward, McLeod," he said in a low voice. But the Colonel answered—

"No, Kennedy, not more than I suppose all men are when it comes to the turning point in their lives. And perhaps you are right here—that is for to judge. I will speak to Cecil if you like."

"Oh, McLeod, how can I thank you?"

But for the shadow in which the Colonel stood, Lord Kennedy must have seen the ghastly whiteness that overspread McLeod's face, and the sudden shrinking at those eager thanks. But the Colonel said quietly—

"By not thanking me, my dear boy. But remember that in speaking to Cecil I can only tell her that you wish to become a suitor for her hand, that if she loves you, I will give her into your keeping, because I trust you. But I can in no way urge her, or bias her mind. I mean that I must leave her perfectly free and unfettered to make her own choice."

"I could—I wish to ask nothing more," replied Lord Kennedy. "It is only because she is so different from other girls that I ask you, as it were, to prepare her, for what I so fear might be a shock. You understand, McLeod?"

"Perfectly! Well, then, I will do this for you." He paused a moment, and then added, "And you are willing to trust me in this, Kennedy?"

"Trust you? Why, of course!" exclaimed the young man in surprise. "What can you be thinking of, McLeod?" I know—at least I fancy—that if Cecil—forgive me, Miss Verner—leaves you, you must feel it. Who would not miss her? But, look here, McLeod"—and Lord Kennedy put his hand on the Colonel's arm—"I tell you this—if you said you'd plead another fellow's cause with a girl you cared for, I shouldn't have a fear—not one."

"You must have great faith in human nature, Kennedy," said McLeod, half bitterly, half sadly. "Well, I thank you for your trust in me personally."

"But you don't half believe it?"

"I did not say so, dear boy; it might be a dangerous experiment. However, let that pass. Lovers are proverbially impatient"—and he spoke with a smile now. "I suppose you will expect to hear from me—when?"

"Nay, I must leave that to you," answered the young man; "only I shall be on thorns till I hear——"

"Ah, it comes to the same thing!" said the Colonel, rather drily. "Well, I will write to you as soon as possible—to-morrow perhaps. Don't be building up palaces of hope, my good fellow; there may be bitter disappointment in store for you. But it is ill preaching caution to a lover."

Lord Kennedy smiled and colored slightly. He shook his head as he held out his hand.

"I suppose you think it is all madness, McLeod?" he said, half laughing. And he could not understand the momentary glance of the Colonel's soft dark eyes. "Good-bye. I can't say how I thank you for your generous kindness in receiving me. It is something to have the approval of such a man as you."

Loris McLeod bowed his head as though in thanks for the young man's frank praise; but he said nothing in answer now. So near as was the close of that terrible interview, the strain seemed to him almost more than he could bear. Nevertheless he saw his visitor to the door, and watched him ride ... his hands across his forehead, he bent down on the desk before him, and a hoarse whisper passed his lips.

"Oh, Cecil! Oh, my life, my heart! Miss her! How shall I give her up?"

Then came a terrible fear that he might fail here when honour bound him—that he could not look into those large clear eyes and not tell her how his heart was hungering for her love. Would not his lips utter, even against his will, other words than those he would speak.

He started up suddenly, and almost staggered to his feet, his hand grasping the arm of the chair.

"Ah—her voice!" He heard her singing as she came across the hall, the notes clear and sweet as those of a bird. She must have just come in from riding, he concluded. She was coming there; to the library; but he could not meet her now—not now.

"All in the dark!" cried Cecil.

The sweet fresh voice seemed to pierce his heart now like a knife. She came in, her riding-dress gathered in one hand; and she threw down her hat.

"Oh, such a jolly ride, Colonel McLeod! But—why—what"—she stopped abruptly, bent forward, and then sprang to his side—"what has happened? You look as though you had had some terrible shock!"

Her voice, her touch, her actual presence forced him to make one supreme effort—an effort that for a moment seemed to make his heart stand still.

"I cannot see you now," he half muttered, turning aside. "It is nothing. I had—another time. Leave me, child—in pity leave me—alone!"

She was startled, bewildered, and pained by the change she saw in him. Colonel McLeod was usually so quiet and reserved in manner; but, when he spoke to her just now, it seemed that all his control could not render his voice steady. And what was the meaning of those quivering lips, and that bowed head? Oh, what could have happened to cause him such bitter pain? Cecil wondered. Yet she had no right, no claim to strive even to soothe him when he bade her go. How could she, who was so young, intrude on this awful sorrow of a man between whom and herself stretched a wide gulf of years? She turned away sorrowfully with drooping head, all her brightness gone, and walked down the room.

He saw it all, and knew that her pain was for him; yet he let her go. He stood motionless, looking at the tall slender form vanishing in the darkness. Leaning forward, with one hand pressed to his heart, the other still grasping, with an iron clasp, the arm of the chair, he heard the door close, and her light step on the pavement without; but there was no joyous singing now. Then, with one deep-drawn breath that was almost a sob, he dropped upon one knee, raised his eyes to that dear symbol of all he must ever love and cling to, the glittering sword above him, and murmured, "For honour—for honour!"

CHAPTER VI.

Cecil entered her dressing-room with a sort of stunned feeling. The quick sympathetic nature had long since discerned that Colonel McLeod's life had been a very sorrowful one, and, with a child's earnest faith, Cecil had striven hard to bring to him some of her sunshine and brightness. But what was this fresh blow that had struck him? What could it all mean? Had bad news come from South Africa, whence there were more than rumors of war? Was he going out? Surely that would have been to him a cause for rejoicing rather than for such anguish as she had read in his face!

She wearied herself with conjectures to which she could find no answer, and she stood quite still by the toilet-table, her hands crossed before her, the tears gathering in her eyes and dropping one by one on the cover. Alone in bitter pain! Why might she not be with him? Why not try to soothe him? Yet she could well understand how the mere presence of one he loved best would be a new torture in any suffering. And why should he care to have her beside him?

The door opening roused her and taught Cecil Verner her first lesson in dissimulation. She brushed away her tears and appeared to be very busy with her riding-habit as Alice entered, eager, excited, and flushed.

"Oh, Cecil," she cried, springing forward, "what do you think I have just heard?"

"What?" said Cecil, turning listlessly.

"Ah, you won't be apathetic, I promise you!" returned Alice, shaking her head and brimming over with her news. "It's about your Colonel!"

Cecil started as if stung, and flushed suddenly.

"What—what do you mean?" she asked, with no want of interest now. Her first idea was that it was something connected with the war.

"Do you remember," said Alice, "my asking him about medals the first day we came, and he didn't seem to like to talk about it? Well, it's all explained now. I've been hearing the strangest story from Mr. Fairleigh. You know know I went with Mrs. Annandale to Hereford Court, and, while the old fogies talked, we strolled about the gardens. I was great fun, Cecil, and I know the Colonel doesn' care for Fairleigh."

"I suppose that constitutes the 'fun?'" said Cecil drily, but with a flash of her bright eyes.

"Oh, well, not exactly! I'm not such a hero-worshipper as you. Thre doesn't seem much to worship here, I should think. Don't fly at me, Cecil. Just listen. Fairleigh told me that Colonel McLeod had been tried by a court-martial in India for 'failure in duty' and condemned, and that, though the people at the Horse Guards reversed the sentence and only censured him, no one has thought anything of him since, and——"

A Plain Statement of Facts.

(London Truth.)

We English have not yet fully realized what utter knaves the ruling Pashas in Turkey are. We solemnly read their dispatches and their State papers as though they were not written with the deliberate intention to deceive, and we ask them to make pledges, as though they would be binding on them. So long as we regard these scamps as anything but a gang of shameless tricksters, ready to sell themselves and their country to the highest bidder, we shall vainly endeavour to handle the Eastern question. There are but two arguments which they understand—money and the stick. If we are not prepared to buy them or to beat them, we should not waste time in negotiations, but withdraw from all communication with them.

If the time ever comes when a lie will help a man you will be able to tan leather with the bark of a dog.

A young man in Russia of decided ability was attacked by an acute disease brought on by dissipation. After his recovery he was found to have lost all his mental faculties except calculation and memory. These were increased to such a degree that he could surpass all mathematicians in power of mental calculation, and could repeat poetry which occupied several minutes in reading after hearing it only once. In all other respects he is a helpless idiot.

The Cross of the Legion of Honour is counted especially honourable when worn by a tradesman in France. A legionary who goes through the Bankruptcy Court ceases ipso facto to belong to the order. To be decorated is to be sure of credit. Merchants therefore strive hard to obtain the decoration, which must not be paraded in advertisements, or on trade circulars or cards.

A Melbourne correspondent writes: "A singular circumstance is reported from a hot, dry valley in New South Wales. Last year the drought there was of long duration, and the denizens of the apiaries suffered much from it. This year the bees have made provision against a similar emergency. They have filled a large number of the external cells in every hive with pure water, instead of honey. It is thought that the instinct of the creatures leads them to anticipate a hot summer."

MAUREL, the baritone, who sang so acceptably in New York a few years ago, has been engaged at the Paris Opera for three years. He is to receive $300 a night, and is to appear at least ten times a month during his first year, eleven times during the second, and twelve during the third. He is to have three month's leave of absence in each year. At present he is singing at Florence.

CARNIVAL.—The third masquerade carnival of the season was held on the Flesherton skating rink, on Wednesday 23rd ult. The ice was all that could be desired, even better than on previous masquerades. Mr. F. Sarjeant the proprietor has made an allowance for the very cold night by having an extra supply of hot coffee, cakes and sandwiches on hand, which was highly relished by those present. The brass band rendered some very fine music during the evening, which put considerable life into the skaters.

FIRE.—Last Friday evening a fire which might have proved disasterous broke out in the Mr. Sproule's dwelling house, caused by a lamp falling off the table, the oil took fire and burned the window curtains and part of the carpet before the flames could be subdued. Mr. Sproule was very fortunate in seeing the fire before it had made much headway.

Correspondence.

NOTICE.—We wish it disinctly understood, that we do not hold ourselves reponsible for the opinions expressed by our correspondents.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

SIR,—In the name of the Trustees I have to thank you for your plain practical observations in reference to the school closets, which appeared in last week's STANDARD. At first I was disposed to think your remarks were too severe, but personal observation have since convinced me that the facts are (making due allowance for pardonable exaggeration) as stated by you. For such a state of affairs we have neither excuse nor apology to offer, it is quite inexcuseable; yet in common fairness and justice we cannot admit that the trustees are to blame. During the summer holidays we had the closets thoroughly cleaned and renovated. The school, for reasons known to many of your readers, during autumn and early winter, owing to which the idea never occurred to the Trustees that the closets had become particularly offensive at this early day. Now for the resposibility, you Sir, would not expect that the trustees should be continually keeping "watch and ward" over the school and premises, this we conceive to be the duty of the teachers, and certainly if the had done their duty in the premises and reported the case to the trustees, the evil would have been remedied before it assumed such disagreeable proportions.

THE (CHURCH) ENVELOPE SYSTEM.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

DEAR SIR,—The above system is being introduced in the villages generally, as it has been in towns and cities. The Presbyterian and Methodist churches in Dundalk, have both introduced them, and I understand that J. B. Graham has charge of the book for the former, and J. Symington for the latter, to whom parties in that place are to apply to for evelopes. They have been used in the Presbyterian church Markdale for some years, and in the Methodist church for over a year. In Flesherton they talk of bringing them into use. A few words as to the working of the system might be of interest to the readers of the STANDARD, espacially those who may think of introducing the system into any of the different branches of the church. For instance the Methodist Church, Markdale. Each member of the church, or congregation, or any person who wishes to give anything towards the ministers salary, is supplied with say a dozen envelopes, that is, one for each week during the quarter. Their name is taken down in a book kept for the purpose, and numbered, their envelope having the same number, they put into the envelope the amount they wish to give each week, seal and place it on the collection plate each Sunday. The amounts are entered in the book and paid to the minister the day following. An account is kept in this way of what is received through the envelopes as well as from other sources and a financial statement is made out at the end of the year, and printed, a copy for every one who gave anything in any way towards the ministers salary, and how much each one contributed. The system is, I think, a very convenient one for those interested, and should be encouraged by all who would like to see their minister paid.

Yours &c.,
PROGRESS.

ORANGE VALLEY SCHOOL.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

DEAR SIR,—Permit me a small space in the columns of you valuable paper to give a small account, but still a correct account, of an erruption that took place in the Orange Valley school, section No. 2, Artemesia, caused by Bartholemew Wright, trustee of said school, by sending his children to school after rising up in eight days time from having the diphtheria. When I John Ford, trustee of said school, heard that they were going to be sent to school in such a short time after having the disease, I went out on the morning they were to come to prevent them from going to the school, I met Mr. Hall, the school teacher on the road, and I told him what I heard was going to take place. Then I met with Batty Wright's children, first I questioned the little girl about it, she told me it was about a week from they had the disease. Then I met with the boys, the oldest boy told me it was about two weeks since he had it. I didn't know at the time that the other boy had it, but he told me afterwards in the school house that it was about eight days from he had it. I told them at the time when I first met them on the road that I could not allow them to go to school for some time, so they went home, I told them I wondered that their father ever dared to send them, and told that if Mr. Wright was not satisfied with that, he could go to Mr. Cunningham the other trustee, I suppose he did go but what took place I cannot exactly say. I went out on the following morning, after sending the children home to turn a boy out of the school that was only an intruder there from another section, as the school house was crowded to its utmost capacity, with the children of our own section, to my great astonishment I found Mr. Wright's children back to school. I went down to see the other trustee about it, and also to see about turning the intruder out of the school. We were coming up to the school and met Batty Wright on the road, we told him what we were about, and asked him to keep his children at home for some time, he said he would not and defied us to turn the intruder out, we then went to the school house to see what could be done about things. We were not sure we could turn Mr. Wright's children out according to law, but we turned the intruder out immediately. We decided for to have a doctor called in. The doctor came and he gave it as his opinion that there was not much danger as to the disease spreading. I went to the school the following morning to hear the doctors decision. The teacher told me what the doctor had said. I said then that I was not satisfied with the decision. I thought that there was false representations made to the doctor, and if there had been truthful statements made and a thorough explanation of the case, I had no doubt the decision would have been different. It turned out as I thought it was, Dr. Christoe told me afterwards it was Batty Wright that gave him the information, and told him it was two weeks clear from they had the disease in the house or something to that affect, and mislead the doctor proving by his own statements to the doctor and also to Mr. Cunningham and me, and by what the boys and little girl had told me on the road and in the school house before the teacher and also the scholars, that it was only eight days from they had it till they were sent to school. I had forgot to mention the doctor told me if he had got a correct statement of the case, that his decision would certainly have been different to what is was. When I seen that nothing else would do, I concluded to call a public meeting of the ratepayers to discuss the question, and to see what could be done in the matter, which was held on Saturday, Feb. 19th, 1881, in the school house, at 2 o'clock p. m. Mr. Anderson of Orange Valley was elected secretary, and his majesty the Little King of the West was elected chairman, which he did not fill to the satisfaction of the people, nor very creditably to himself. When the discussion took place on the question every one that spoke denoucred Batty Wright and his actions in the matter, except Batty the Premier and His Majesty King Whitby, which upheld the premier and his proceedings. When the question was dicussed all through, and explanations made as far as we knowed of then, when a vote was going to be taken to see what side the people was on, it was to this affect moved by John Ford, seconded by Christopher Irwin, that all ratepayers and voters in this school section that upholds me in the action I have taken in trying to prevent Batty Wright's children from coming to this school after so recently rising up out of, or from such a contagious disease as diphtheria, and to try to prevent the spread of the same, and all ratepayers in the said school section that denounces Batty Wright and the action has htake he and the course he has pursued in sending his children to school after so recently rising up out of the said disease shall take this side of the school house, and all ratepayers in the said school section that denouces me in the action I have taken and the course I have pursued and all said ratepayers that upholds Batty Wright in the action he has taken and the course he has pursued shall take that side of the school house. This was the form of voting that I wanted, but it was taken by a show of hands, and ever one in the house voted against Batty Wright except himself and his majesty the little King, which did not vote at all. His Majesty tried to twist and twine and construe thibgs in every possible shape to modify his premier's guilt, but he did not get his subjects in this part of his little kingdom to coinside with him and his premier as they are not quite so loyal to him as they are about his own court. I had forgot to mention the prosperous state the school was in before the eruption, we had about 75 or 80 pupils attending school, and then it dwindled down in a few day to about half the number, thereby causing a great loss to the section in many respects, which I consider Batty Wright ought to be compelled to pay all damages. Thanking you Mr. Editor for the space you have give me in your valuable paper.

I remain yours respectfully,
JOHN FORD,
Trustee of S. S. No. 2, Artemesia.

THE meeting held in Campbell's Hall on Thursday last to take into consideration the building of another grain warehouse here, was well attended. Some $1,400 stock was promised, and a provisional committee appointed to come to an understanding with the railway company as to rates and otherwise get the matter into proper working shape. There is scarcely any doubt now that the enterprise will succeed. It will be an excellent thing both for the village and surrounding country, and should receive a libral encouragement from the residents of both.—O. S. Advertiser.

IT is now definitely settled that Mr. Rae will build a steam grist mill here during the coming summer. He has selected and purchase a site near the railway station and intends to remove here in a few days. It is expected the mill will contain three run of stone—one for custom work, another principally for chopping, and a third for shipping. If a steam grist mill succeeds anywhere it should here. Should the new grain warehouse, grist mill, and the tannery be built here during the coming summer it will create considerable stir and be an excellent thing both for the village and the section of country around it.—O. S. Advertiser.

ODE TO THE NEW YEAR.

BY REV. ....

[The following lines were written by Mr. Robert Reid, father of the first Mrs. Beattie. They were discovered by a member of the family a short time since, among some old manuscripts, and sent to us with the request that we would publish them, which we do with pleasure.]

Again swift footed time hath sped
Its annual fixed career,
And we've .... step begun
A new eventful year.

Fit season sure by heaven designed,
For retrospective view,
To call the period passed to mind,
And life begin a new.

How swift the flight of time has been,
How short the past appears;
A scanty glance surveys the scene,
Of many absent years.

Yet short and fleeting as they are,
Important things depend,
On what report to heaven they bear,
And how their flight shall end.

From God they came, and space afford
To man's .... and use;
To God they fly, with full record,
Of blessing or abuse.

I would my squander'd days redeem,
My tears unspent bemoan,
And all my future life esteem
As held for God alone.

UNCLE ISAAC'S VIEW

Some of the finest expressions of religious faith, and of its infinite value, have come from the warm hearts that beat under the swarthy bosoms of the African race. When the "Lime-Kiln Club" was called on to state its position towards the atheist's doctrine of no God, the president called on "Uncle Isaac Walpole" to give the sense of the meeting ... old man, says the Free Press, wrinkled, and burdened with the weight of seventy years, rose in his seat, looked about and quietly began:

"If dar am no God den dar am no furchur. When we close our eyes in death de soul dies wid us an' we moulder to dust de same as de brutes. It has been a long journey to me. In my heart am de graves of wife and chill'en. My days have bin cloudy an' full of woe. My nights have been dark an' full of sorrow. I have bin robbed, cheated, abused an' made to feel my wretchedness, but nebber, not eben in my darkest hour, did I doubt dar was a God, nor did I loose faith in Him. Take away dat faith to-night—Make me believe dat dar am no Heaben—tell me dat I won't meet my poor old Chloe an' de blessed chill'en up dar 'mong de angles, an' you would crush me down an' brake my ole heart. Dat's all I pear to be libin fur—to wait de Master's call to close de ledger of life an' go home! I am old an' poor an' lowly, but Leah in my breast am a feelin' dat I wouldn't sell fur all de gold in de world—dat all de arguments of a million ob men could not change—a feeling dat poor as I am an' lowly as I am, de grave will not be de las' of me." During his remarks the hall was as quite as the grave. When he had finished it was a full minute before any one moved. Then Brother Gardner softly said, "As says Uncle Isaac, so say we all."

Great credit [illegible] plement Warerooms, Dundalk, on March 15th. J. W. Morrow [illegible] the [illegible].

You will always find at Reynolds & Son's, the cheapest of teas, our new dust tea is remarkably good and cheap.

Manufacturers of reapers, mowers and threshing machines, prefer "Castorine" machine oil to any other, it will out wear lard, seal, or elephant, and is warranted not to gum.

One of the most loathsome and terrible diseases of our climate is Chronic Catarrh. When the poisoning matter is constantly falling upon the lungs, Pulmonary Consumption is certain to follow. Expell morbid secretions from the Bronchial pipes by Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam, the great throat and lung healer. Sold by all dealers at 25 cents per bottle.

LOOK BEFORE YOU STOP. That is examine W. J. McFarland's new arrivals of spring prints, black cashmeres and lustres.

J. W. Morrow is big on auction sales. He "bosses" one on the farm of Mr. George Acheson, Township of Proton, on Monday, March 14th.

The more you know about W. J. McFarland's Teas the more you like them. He sold 574 pounds last week, no wonder he can import direct from the place of growth.

R. J. McCoy, Markdale, Licensed Auctioneer for the county, sales attended in all parts of the county. The only Licensed Auctioneerin Markdale for 1881.

Butter & Rae say there is a great rush at their store; that three women were after a pound of Butter—no, a dozen herring. Read their advertisement, then call on them and see for yourselves.

Messrs. McKenna & Mason having entered into partnership, announce that they are prepared to turn out anything in their line from a wheel barrow to a first-class carriage.

The season for sugar making is fast approaching, and promises to be the best we have had for many years. Those wanting sap buckets cannot do better than call on Hasket Bros, and leave their order. They are remarkably cheap this season.

Our P. M. friends intend holding a tea meeting in the school house known as the 70 school house, about four miles up the gravel, on Friday evening next, a good programme has been arraged; admission 25c.; tea at 7 p. m; a good time is expected.

Sad.—An accident happened on the 18th ult., to Wm. Davis a young man 25 years of age, which resulted in his death eight days after. Drs. Christoe, Carter and McGregor attended him. His friends wish us to say that he received the kindest attention by the people where the accident happend (Robt. Thompson's, Lot 140, 2nd con., west T. & S. road, Artemesia, and also from Dr. Christoe.

Rheumatism is one of the most prevalent and obstinate diseases incident to our climate, but it has been disarmed of its terrors by that invincible remedy, Hagyard's Yellow Oil, an external and internal medicine whose application is so varied and useful in all painful and inflammatory diseases and wounds, as to render it a household necessity to all who suffer from pain.

In another column will be found the advertisement of money to loan, of Mr. E. E. Knott, Euphrasia, at 6 per cent. yearly. This is, we believe, the the lowest rate yet offered, and he has taken the trouble to send us a circular from headquarters to prove that he is authorized to do so. Mr. Knott has built up a very extensive business in the money loaning, and real estate line, and his name is known as a very straight forward business man, and unusually energetic, backed up by a very high financial standing, himself, there is no question about his being in a position to relieve the borrowing public, and we would recommend them to give him a trial.

We understand that the ticket holders of the Dundalk skating rink, were quite dissatisfied with the proprietor because he charged them the the same as others for admittance to the mas querade. We believe the general custom is for ticket holders to pay when they go as spectators only. Now as the proprietor has been to considerable expense in building the rink, thereby furnishing a place for healthful amusement, and has only given one masquerade this long winter, while his neighbors have given three or four each, we think the least the ticket holders and others interested can do, is to encourage the proprietor to give one more before the season closes, and support him well if he consents.

What a multitude of martyrs suffer from Headache! either of the nervous or bilious form. The principal cause of the distress is disordered Stomach and Liver, for which Burdock Blood Bitters is a positive specific. It cures constipation of the Bowles, eliminates disease from the Kidneys, arouses the secretions to a healthy action purifies the blood, regulates the Liver, strengthens the debilitated system. Sample Bottles 10 cts. Regular size $1.00

Fatal Termination of a Runaway.—Once more a sudden death has to be recorded, but this time it was caused by an accident liable to befall even the strongest or most careful. The name of the victim is John Perritt, a young married man, 32 years of age, residing at No. 139 Queen street east, and at the time of his death a student in the Toronto School of Medicine. Twelve months ago he removed to this city from Rocklyn, near Meaford, where he occupied the position of postmaster for the past five years, and until recently he boarded on Shelbourne street but in January last removed to his last residence. Last night he had an appointment at the Walker house, and while crossing Queen street, opposite Osgoode Hall, was knocked down by a runnaway horse, and received the injures from which he died. When picked up he was still breathing but quite unconscious, and was carried into the Osgoode house, where the proprietor, Mr. Smith, did all in his power to bring him round. Drs McDonald and Wagner were soon in attendance, but their service were of no avail, and in a few minutes the unfortunate man breathed his last. He leaves a widow and two small children. Coroner Riddle was duly notified, and although he cannot take the required oath, will hold an inquest at the St. George hotel, corner of Queen and George streets, to-morrow afternoon at three o'clock. An examination of the body showed the top of the skull to be fractured, and leads to the supposition that after he was knocked down the deceased had been kicked by the horse.—Mail.

WOMEN GOSSIP.

Meet me in the moonlight—
Meet me in the dell;
If the stars behold us,
Will they ever tell?
Meet me when the moon be bright, love,
Never heed the skies!
Need we gaze at heaven—
Are they not your eyes?

Let the gentle breezes
Whisper as they fly;
Still they cannot echo
All that we may sigh.
Who shall ever listen
Who shall ever tell
We were in the moonlight,
Kissing in the dell!

The genders or sexes we know are three,—masculine, feminine, and neuter,—or, as Sydney Smith said, "Men, women, and clergymen." Can't Do Without it.

The following correspondence over the telephone wire yesterday is a further proof of the fact that no one but a bald-headed man could do without one:

"Hello, central!"
"Hello!"
"Connect me with the signal bureau."
"All right—go ahead."
"Hello! signal!"
"Hello!"
"Is it going to thaw to-day?"
"Yes, there are indications."
"Will it be warm?"
"Getting around to the south."
"Do you think I can safely have my hair cut?"
"Wait a minute until I consult the barometer, thermometer and wind-gauge."
(Silence for half a minute.)
"Hello!"
"Hello!"
"Yes, you can go ahead. There won't be a cold day to speak of for the next twelve hours. There is a cold wave moving up the Ohio Valley, and a snowstorm is reported at Cheyenne, but if I were you I'd take my chances on the hair cutting and get my neck shaved to boot."
"All right—much obliged."
"Good-bye."

The Russians in Central Asia.

(From the Pall Mall Gazette.)

The news of the capture of Geok-Tepe will be received with much satisfaction throughout Russia. Michael O'Shaughnessy's Funeral.

There is not much mock-solemnity about the poor Irishman's funeral. The hearse, mourning-coaches, and other usual paraphernalia give place to a train of open carts, on the foremost of which is laid the coffin; the length of the whole procession varying with the popularity of the deceased. But there is no want of feeling in the simplicity; and such a procession usually possesses a natural solemnity of its own, as it slowly passes, for miles perhaps, by mountain and moor until it reaches its destination, in some lonely but too often neglected burial-ground.

But if the generality of funerals among the poor Irish are not remarkable for an appearance of mock-misery, that of Michael O'Shaughnessey the cattle dealer had none of any kind. It went to the other extreme; it was a very chapter of accidents—a very joke at death, though not altogether an unsuitable way for so merry a fellow to go to his grave. Mike was dead, waked, and lay in a coffin on a cart at his cabin door, whence his funeral was about to start. The widow O'Shaughnessy was very sad; for Mike, for five-and-twenty years, had been a good husband to her; but most of her groaning and wailing had been exhausted at the wake; and it was with a respectable subdued grief, a sense of proud proprietorship and conscious dignity, that she took her seat in the cart on the top of Mike's coffin. Every face she saw round her, she knew; every eye looked sympathy; and the widow's frame of mind was more complacent than it had been since Mike's death. It was a fine winter morning; and the procession, which was nearly a quarter of a mile long, started early, as there were five miles to be passed at a walking pace between the village and the burial-ground. The cart bearing the body of Mike was drawn by his own horse Shoneen, and driven by Daveen, the youngest, but only son then left at home; and Daveen could not suppress a smile of triumph at the dignity of his post.

The procession started, and passed safely and steadily out of the village; and steadily and solemnly it continued for something like a mile; but it was the calm that comes before a storm. A gentleman of the neighbourhood, one of the race of improvers, had established on his farm a steam-plough, a contrivance hitherto unknown in that part of the world; and it so happened with him that he was making a first trial of it on this particular morning. It was therefore hardly to be wondered at that, when our mourners came to the field in which the engine was at work, Shoneen should show his disapproval of such a foreign institution by shying at it. Daveen did his best to "soother" his astonished and indignant steed; but his efforts were in vain; Shoneen took fright, broke into an uneasy trot, and from that into a runaway gallop. Daveen stood up on the coffin, to get more command over him, and pulled with all his might; but it was of no use. The widow screamed, but kept to her post, clinging on to the sides of the cart. Shoneen was tearing along like the wind. The whole train of carts behind followed—a quarter of a mile of them—at the top of their speed, in chase of the runaway. The hunt continued, growing keener and more exciting every minute. Those behind were striving who should come up first. The whip was laid on unsparingly. They shouted, gesticulated, and encouraged each other and the horses. Ragged urchins, beggars brandishing sticks, boys on donkeys, every one they came up with joined in the pursuit, and all enjoyed it.

'The hounds are out to-day,' cried one; 'but 'twill be a good fox that'll give them such a run as Mike O'Shaughnessy's giving us this day.'

'Faith, 'tis more like a dhrag-hunt,' cried another.

'Hurry on, boys,' from a third; 'let's be in at the death.'

'Arrah,' from another, ''tis Micky himself would have liked to have been out of his coffin this day—'twould just plase him.'

And so on, as field and common and hill were left behind in turn; Daveen doing his best, as he could not pull in, to guide his horse, as he dashed over the rough roads, over steep bridges, and through the brooks that ran across their path, a hundred times narrowly escaping an upset. The widow in terror would fling her arms about wildly, which those behind took for signals of encouragement, and redoubled their efforts to come up with them. The joking continued all the while. 'I often heard tell of a runaway weddin',' said one; 'but bedad, who ever heard tell of a runaway funeral before?'

It did not last much longer, though, for the cavalcade came up with a drove of pigs, which it could not pass, and then Shoneen suddenly halted, nearly jerking the widow and her deceased lord into their midst. With the recovery of her breath, the widow turned to Daveen. 'Ah, Daveen'—very reproachfully—'was that any way at all to be dhriving your poor misfortunate dada to the grave? Shame, Daveen! If it had been an exciseman now, or a Prothesant itself—but your own dada!'

'Not a step farther,' replied Daveen, much crestfallen, 'will I dhrive Shoneen this day. The divil himself is in him—so he is.'

They were waiting in the road for the stragglers, some having been left behind in the chase; and even the presence of the widow could not now check the fun among the people.

'Well done, Daveen!' said one; 'you dhruv your dada in great style. 'Tis this very way he'd choose to go to glory himself; he always had a great mind for a hunt.'

''Tis the way,' said another. 'Shoneen knew 'twas the last time he'd be carrying the ould masther; he was jist showing how willing he was to the work.'

'He knew we were late,' said a third; 'and he wouldn't be kaping his Riverance's dinner waiting.'

'O Micky, Micky!' cried the widow, apostrophising her deceased lord, 'you were an onaisy crature in your life, and you can't go to the grave—God bless you!—like a dacent Christian. Here, James Barry, come and dhrive Mike to the grave; I won't thrust Daveen again with the reins.'

Again they fell into order, and got under-way, traveling slowly, to make up for the dignity lost by their late speed. But the fates were against the widow; and Mike was not to be buried without another mishap. They were about a mile and a half now from their destination, passing along a lane with high banks on each side, as quiet as they had previously been boisterous; but the merriment, though subdued, was ready to break out again on the least provocation. The widow had resumed her seat on the coffin, and James Barry, a middle-aged man, had taken Daveen's post. As they slowly and peacefully passed down the long lane, a shrewder woman than Mrs. O'Shaughnessy would not have pictured any near misadventure; but it so happened that the foxhounds were out that day, and that a certain Major, a dark and fierce-looking man, was riding a black horse, and riding hard, at a little distance from the rest of the 'field.' The land on one side of the lane along which the funeral was passing was above the level of the lane, there being a high bank on the side next the lane, and only a moderate fence towards the field. Over this land came the Major, riding hard; and coming to its end, saw what he thought an easy fence, little dreaming that, between, was a lower level—a road—a funeral. Over he went—over, and alighted on the top of the first cart, sending the widow and the coffin flying into the ditch. Oh, the confusion of that moment! The widow in the ditch had flung her arms around the coffin, and shrieked in terror. 'Marciful saints!' she cried, ''tis the divil himself come for Micky!' and the sudden appearance of the stranger on the black horse certainly looked suspicious. 'But I won't lave you, Mike O'Shaughnessy; I'll sthand by you to the last!'

The widow was not the only frightened one—an awful whisper went from end to end of the procession that his Satanic majesty had appeared on a black horse, and was to take part in the ceremony! But in another minute, seeing the unfortunate Major trying to pick up himself and his horse, their momentary fright was gone, and gave place to shouts of laughter. The widow all the while hugging the coffin in the ditch, kept glancing in terror at the mayor, who, covered with mud from head to foot, began to look human.

''Tisn't the divil at all, Biddy,' cried one; ''tis only an army Capt'n.'

'Faith, and that's a most the same,' exclaimed another.

Biddy started up; her fear and grief were lost in indignation. 'Arrah, bad scran to you!' she cried, shaking her fist at the Major, 'you thafe o' the world—you ould black-garred! Oughtn't you be ashamed of yourself, to be desthroying a poor widdy woman going paceably with her husband to be buried! What harrum did Mike ever do you, that you should dhrive his corp and his widdy into a dyke? May yourself fare worse, when 'tis your own turn to be buried! Oh, wirra, wirra! you've desthroyed us both!'

'My good woman,' said the Major, choking with laughter, 'I hadn't the least idea that'—

'You hadn't the laste idea! I know well you did it for the purpose. 'Tis a party thing for a fine gintleman like you to be coming over from England to play off your jokes on the widdy and the fatherless, lepping unknownst on top o' them, and skatterin' a dacent funerial into a ditch.'

'Be aisy, Biddy,' said a bystander. 'Twasn't done for the purpose at all. I know his Honour well, and often see him go to the barracks. He's a good gintleman, and I'll go bail he's as vexed as yourself about it.'

'Maybe,' said another, with a grin, 'his Honour will sthand the price of a new coffin.'

'What would be the good of a new coffin?' said the Major. 'You couldn't take him out of the old one and put him into it.'

'I didn't say to sthand a new coffin, your Honour, but the price of one.'

The Major took the hint, and gave the widow a sovereign, which restored peace.

'Long life to you, sorr! and may it be many a day before your Honour's coffin has to thravel, and may it never lie graceful in the bottom of a ditch!' said one.

'And may the fox lade in the opposite direction from your road to the cimith'ry,' cried another.

And so on until the coffin was replaced in the cart, the mud scraped off, and the widow reseated on it; and with many a blessing on the Major, the procession set off again. There was no further accident. Mike was buried at last; and a merrier day, his friends said, they had never spent. Requiescat!

In a Captive Balloon.

This is almost my first introduction to captive work, and the sensation is most decidedly not too pleasant or reassuring. The great balloon above tugs and struggles, as if perfectly conscious of a humiliating state of captivity, and longing to be free. This is especially the case whenever a gust of wind puts a considerable extra strain on the guy rope. The latter, as I have said, is fastened to the hoop above one's head. But it rides against the light wicker work of the car, which creaks and groans in response in a doleful and somewhat distressing manner. Were it not for a powerful spring of india rubber, which checks the oscilliations of the guy rope, and tends to steady the balloon, the effect on one's nerves might be much than it is. But, fortunately, there is not too much time for noticing these matters, for there is a constant necessity for letting go ballast, to meet the continually increasing weight of suspended guy rope below, or the balloon would soon cease to rise. At last the ballast is all expended, and the guy rope is paid out no further. The wind has caused the balloon to drift off to a considerable distance horizontally from the point of departure below, and she now settles into a condition of approximate equilibrium. The height above the ground is shown by the barometer to be about 1,000 feet. The long guy rope hangs in a graceful curve below. The portion next the balloon, for hundreds of feet, is nearly vertical, and that near the ground almost horizontal. But of this I see little. One or two timid glances are quite sufficient, for one's head, naturally a very indifferent one where it is a question of looking down from giddy heights, is not yet acclimitized to the situation by practice in ballooning. So I cannot look at the ground under, or nearly under, the balloon without a shudder and a decidedly creepy sensation. Above all, one must avoid looking down the guy rope, for this, in its long centenary, extending far below, reach after reach, and ending almost in a vanishing point, gives a measure to the eye of the giddy height. And to look along it makes one's brain reel—far worse, as I afterward find, than looking down from thrice the height in a free trip where there is no guy rope. For military purposes, for reconnoitering that is, there can be no question of the value of such a suspended point of observation as this. Every detail in the innumerable buildings below—the workman going to and fro in their work, the ships passing and repassing on the Thames, the Beckton gas-works on the further shore and lower down the river, the artillery exercise ground on Woolwich Commons, the Herbert Hospital and other buildings further away—everything is seen, and in the clearest possible manner. For there is a very sensible advantage in the clearness of view from a balloon as contrasted with that obtained on the ground level, even where the latter is perfectly free and unobstructed by obstacles. It is well known to astronomers, and to all who have to make careful observations of distant objects, that the vision in a horizontal direction is greatly interfered with by the unseen exhalations from the ground, and the varying density of the lowest strata of air at and near the ground. Whereas, at a high angle, as here from the balloon, the rays of light have only to traverse a very limited amount of light of these disturbed strata, and are consequently much more unimpeded and reliable. But the day is wearing on, and I want to get away as early as possible for a free run, so I signal with a flag to lower. The drum is set in motion, and the Sappers below apply themselves steadily to wind the talisman down. This is rather a long business, and the oscillations of the rope which it causes give rise to sensations which remind me very unpleasantly of the rolling of a vessel at sea in a ground swell. It is not without much thankfulness that at last terra firma is reached. The Talisman has lost some considerable amount of gas in the captive ascent, owing to the expansion due to the diminished barometric pressure at 1,000 feet from the ground.

How They Learn to Cook.

(New York Hotel Mail.)

The Australian lady of station who does not know how to cook, one may almost say does not exist. Every detail of the cuisine she is acquainted with. A story is told by Austrian ladies of another who, having neglected her education, allowed, at a great dinner party she gave, two dishes of the same color to be served in succession, a fault for which she was hardly to be forgiven. The Princesses of the Royal households attend a course of lectures from a chief entirely upon the order of serving. Young ladies do not learn the art of cooking at cooking clubs, or from public lessons as here in America, and they rarely learn in their own kitchens. It is the custom to go to some great house, the house of a Princess, or at a very rich banker's, where there are famous chefs, from whom they learn. When a chef engages to cook for a great house he stipulates that he is to have the privilege of teaching as many young ladies as he chooses. These young ladies need not even know the mistress of the house, and they make their arrangements with the cook only. For a course of lessons lasting through the winter each pupil pays the cook 30 gulden, about $15. This includes instruction in every particular. If a banquet is to be given, a grand breakfast, or an elaborate supper, the young ladies are notified, and are there to see the dishes decorated and to learn the order of serving. They watch every process. Were you to descend to a kitchen at such a time you would no doubt find these girls suffused with blushes; for these lessons always foretell marriage, and are the last and finishing touches of a maiden's education. But it would be a breach of etiquette for any member of the household to trespass in that department, which belongs to the cook and his noble young pupils. This is very much as if the cooks of the Astors and Vanderbilts were permitted to receive a half dozen young ladies from Fifth Avenue on the occasion of a very grand dinner party and explain to them the mysteries of each dish as it left their hands. Since young ladies must be in the dining-room themselves on such occasions in their own households, it follows that these processes they cannot watch at home, never mind on how grand a scale things are. And so in Austria all noble young ladies learn these things in another kitchen than their own.

The Poet and the Engraver.

I am reminded of what I heard yesterday anent a literary veteran and a famous old artistic engraver. The literary man is Dr. Holland and the famous artistic engraver the English Linton, long resident in New York. He was engaged for the illustration of Dr. Holland's "Katrina"; one day he was summoned by the publishers and shown the blocks, which outmeasured the page, and asked to refit them. "Oh, no!" he couldn't do that. But he must; there was no alternative.

"Oh, yes, there was!"

"What was that?"

"Cut off a few of Dr. Holland's verses,—they would never be missed!"

There was a slight unpleasantness for years between the Doctor and Mr. Linton, for this and similar slips of Mr. Linton's tongue, but they made it up not a great while ago, and the old artist engraver now holds a discreet and respectful silence where he once held forth to the amusement of his auditors.

The uncertainty of meal taking brings with it a craving for stimulants.

MATTERS DRAMATIC.

"The Danites" had its thousandth performance a few nights ago in Philadelphia, and is worn out. The Rankins, to whom it has brought a fortune, intend to try another mining camp play next fall.

Classic Tickets.

Common in classical antiquity were the tickets of admission to circuses and amphitheatres. These are frequently little "squeezes" of baked clay, the material having been pressed into moulds bearing the effigies appropriate to certain stages, as tiers of seats in the theatre, or such as were proper to the city to which each belonged. For example, an elephant stood for one place or tier, an eagle for another. On the back of many of these tickets are to be seen the imprints of the thumbs of the makers, veritable signs-manual of classical antiquity—marks of thumbs that perished 2,000 years ago.

What Caused Sothern's Success.

The late Edward A. Sothern once said that he owed his success on the stage chiefly to earnestness "doing as well as I know how," he added, "never acting on the impulse of the moment, and thoroughly understanding what I had to do. I owe much of my success to the elder Wallack and to Rachel. Wallack showed me the necessity of conveying at a rehearsal what you intend to do at night, and the importance of paying strict attention to the minutest detail. He was one of the most thorough stage managers I ever met. We were like a set of school-boys under discipline. We had to give a reason for everything, and therefore to study hard."

Pinafore's Successor.

Pinafore is to have a successor. A new nautical comic opera is soon to invade this country. Its title is "Billee Taylor." He P. Stevens, the writer of the libretto, is a clever man, though this is his first success. The music is by Edward Solomons, and is light and catching. The story of the opera is foundered on the old song of "Billy Taylor," a well known mariner's ditty, and the authors, in order to preserve the copyright of their work, spelled the name differently. It now reads "Billee." The time of the action is 1805, when the press gang was in full sway. The first act opens with a view of Southampton Harbor at the old inn of the Royal George, where the villagers have met to rejoice over the approaching wedding of Billee and Phebe, a charity girl. Two years elapse before the second act begins. The scene represents Portsmouth Harbor. Ships are coming and going, while the sailors and their sweethearts sit around the docks watching some seamen dancing the hornpipe. In Pinafore there are "the sisters, and the cousins, and the aunts;" in the Pirates of Penzance there are the twenty-four charming daughters of the Major-General; and in "Billee Taylor" there will be an array of charity girls and another set of peasant girls. It requires sixty persons to produce the opera.

Stage Ghosts.

We fear the ghost of the stage has by no means the awe-inspiring effect upon the youthful play-goer of the present day that it once had. We remember many a gear ago how even amidst the primitive surroundings of Richardson's show the appearance of the ghost deeply moved our juvenile hearts. There was a sort of creeping, shivering sensation combined with the expected mystery that we should not altogether object to feel again; for instance, when the ghost revisits the glimpses of the moon in "Hamlet," or comes to young De Franchi in his Corsican home with that strange warning of what is taking place in Paris. The pleasant writers of those agreeable essays recently published under the title of "Free Lance" have some amusing speculations upon the ghost theory, and possibly they are right in supposing that some respect for ghosts yet lingers in the minds of a few, especially in a lonely, remote, shadowy, old houses with avenues of trees leading up to the front door where in the autumn shadows it would not seem unreasonable to conjure up ghostly voices from the rustling of the crisp withering leaves, or to fancy a spectral shade floating in the evening dust from the dim distant meadows. In many old houses too there are legends and strange traditions of strange noises and unexplained tones, which amongst the imaginative easily suggest supernatural visitations. There are various degrees of ghosts. Some are altogether of so shadowy a kind that, beyond a passing feeling of strangeness when they are referred to, they leave but a faint impression upon the mind; but the stage ghost is generally of a substantial kind. In "Hamlet" he has a good strong voice, not at all affected by the chilly atmosphere of the sepulchre, or rendered husky by the warmer place, where, for a time he is supposed to have been immured. He walks about the stage with a firmness of tread altogether different from the kind of ghosts we read of in romances. If any reader would experience the old fashioned mysterious feeling about ghosts he should read the stories of Charles Brockden Brown, the American novelist. They were once popular in England, but appear to be now utterly forgotten. Yet Mr. Wilkie Collins himself hardly tinyes our nerves to the extent that Charles B. Brown does in some of his descriptions. We remember a scene in one of his novels where he describes with astonishing force the effect of hearing somebody or something pacing the floor of a room overhead, where the listener feels it impossible for any human creature to be concealed. Our modern novelists would find it difficult to reach the power displayed in this scene. But the writer has the advantage of being able to work upon the feelings and to appeal to the imagination of the reader. There is not the same difficulty there is upon the stage to awaken an interest in the ghost. The supernatural visitation in the novel is only described, and therefore, the reader can give it any shape or horror he pleases. But there is always the danger on the stage that familiarity will breed contempt. According to the modern plan we are too much at home with the ghosts. We lose sight altogether of their shadowy attributes. We remember reading a letter by Dickens describing the first representation of Gounod's "Faust." So carefully had all the stage been contrived that Dickens says it give him quite a weird sensation. The lurid glare we are accustomed to see whenever the Fiend appears, was cleverly contrasted with the tender, soft, ethereal bluish color surrounding Marguerite, and giving the heroine an appearance of delicacy that threw into stronger relief the figure of the Tempter. We wish the stage had preserved to a greater extent some traditions of the past. For instance, we have read that in Marlowe's Faustus, the audience was deeply impressed by the appearance of the demon. When the modern version of Faust is played little attempt is made to give him a supernatural character. The Prince of Darkness is, in fact, a "modern gentleman." But since there are plays, operas, and tragedies, in which ghostly personages have to appear, it might be well for our stage managers to consider whether they could not make them a little less real. Play-goers are willing to lend themselves to the illusion of the stage, but the stage should lend itself to the imagination as well. Surely it need not be so difficult to get some new ghost business so as to make "Hamlet," "Macbeth," "Richard," and other grand plays in which spectral figures appear more effective than under the ordinary conditions.

CULINERY GEMS.

The stew is the great dish of the future.

Stews should not be cooked too long, as then they evaporate valuable particles.

It is impossible to get warm in cold weather with undigested food in your stomach.

Fish should never be boiled but steamed, so that no fine properties are dissolved in the water.

Exclusive diet on peas, beans and lentils, do not develop the brightest and quickest tone of mind.

Food is only coarse when coarsely cooked, as the plainest materials contain nutritious and dainty elements.

It's a great mistake to eat half raw steaks on a cold winter's day. Half raw meat yields much less nutrition than well cooked meat.

Vegetables are the life and soul of healthy living, and should not be neglected at any meal.

If meals are kept irregularly in youth something creeps up in adult age which shows diminished vitality.

The want of a warm meal in the middle of the day is to people who have had perhaps but a slight breakfast and have been in the cold winter air, the cause of disease and want of vitality.

British Bobbies.

AN INTERESTING HISTORY OF THE GREAT POLICE FORCE OF THE ENGLISH CAPITAL.

(New York Times.)

Perhaps nothing more clearly shows the devotion with which the English people adhere to the old forms of government than the story of the police systems of London. Systems is the word used, for there are two separate and distinct police forces for the metropolis of London. The city of London, as is well known, constitutes but a small part of the metropolis, and in the heart of a great community, swarming with people and crowded with buildings, its few squares and small population after business hours, still maintain a local government of lord mayor, aldermen, magistrates, and police as well. To speak more accurately, the city of London, with an area of 688 acres, and a population of 74,897, (males 36,459, females 38,438,) is situated in the centre of a metropolis containing an area of 78,868 acres, or 123 square miles, with a population of 4,534,040. These figures are from the metropolitan police district census Dec. 31, 1878. Nor need we look for a comparison beyond the city of New York, which has drawn into its folds towns which lie in the county of Westchester. The subject can easily be made plain to the reader. Suppose, as an illustration, that, notwithstanding the growth of New York in bricks and mortar, it should still, as a corporation, remain bounded by the East and North Rivers, the Battery, and Canal street, its limits half a century ago. That little nucleus of the great city would hold to the whole about the same relation in extent that the city of London does to the modern Babylon. There have been frequent efforts to change this anomalous condition of affairs, but the "city" of London, governed by its ancient charters and special acts of parliament, thus far has been able to resist successfully the various measures aimed at uniting the corporation with the metropolis which surrounds it and joins it. In 1830, Sir Robert Peel (it is from this gentleman's connection with the constituting statute of the London police force that the officers were nicknamed "bobbies" and "peelers") obtained the passage of an act which created the present police force of London. It does not include the city of London. An attempt was made by Lord Melbourne, in 1839, to unite the city with the metropolitan system, but so powerful an opposition came from the corporation of the city of London that the measure was abandoned, and rather than accept the share which would fall to the city for the payment of its police, if in the metropolitan system, the corporation spurned the sum (about £40,000, or $200,000), and resolutely taxed the rate-payers to pay their own police. Under the metropolitan act the British treasury, out of the consolidated fund, defrays one-fourth of the cost of the metropolitan police, the other three-fourths being raised by taxation. In old London every citizen was liable to be called upon to do police duty in the district where he resided. He might employ a person to do the work, although he became responsible for the deputy's misdeeds. In the time of Queen Elizabeth beggars and vagrants had so increased that beadles were appointed to assist in clearing the streets. They in turn were succeeded by city marshals, who remained in power down to 1839, when the new police acts went into operation in the city of London and metropolis.

THE CITY OF LONDON POLICE.

The following is the present organization of the city of London police: Col. C. B. Frazer is the chief commissioner, with a salary of £1,800 ($9,000) per annum, the Mayor Bowman, chief superintendent, who receives for his services £820 $5,000 per an. The police force of the city of London is under the commissioner's command, and it consists of inspectors who receive about $18 per week on an average; 12 detectives at 51s. 3d. each ($12.81). 64 sergeants, whose pay, according to grade of service, ranges from 38s. 11d. each ($9.97) down to 36s. 10d. ($900), and 391 policemen (constables), who receive weekly 32s. 3d. each ($8.06); 320 constables at 28s. 8d. ($7.16); 110 constables at 24s. 7d. ($6.39), making with the services of an assistant superintendent at 137s. 7d. per week ($34 75), a police surgeon at £600 per annum, ($3,000), and three clerks at £250 per annum ($900), a total force of 826 men, who cost the city of London, as is contained in the estimate for 1880, £100,100, or $500 000 to maintain. There are 61 men on private service at the postoffice, the Bank of England and other banks, telegraph offices, and stores. The yearly pay is £95 a man ($475), and the department receives £5 873 yearly for their services or ($29,365). The system of payment of pensions to policemen who have been rendered unfit for duty after long and honorable service has been in force in both this and the metropolitan departments for many years. The city chamberlain of the corporation of London paid to superannuated policemen in 1880, £19 311 17s. 7d., or $46,555. This amount was raised by the fines for assaults on policemen, which amounted to £121 2s., or $605, and by the amount received by the deduction in the pay of the police for misconduct, sickness, etc. Col. Fraser the commissioner of the city police, was appointed by the common council of the city of London in 1863, and is considered an able officer. Mayor Bowan, the assistant commissioner, was also appointed by the common council, and has long been connected with the force. He is a man of middle age, with military bearing. George B. Childs, F. B. C. S. E., was appointed by the police committee of the common council in 1844. He has therefore, been connected with the department thirty-six years.

The uniform of the police of the city of London is very nearly the same as that of the metropolitan police, save a slight variance in the formation of the helmet and the cuff-band, which is a red and white stripe instead of the blue and white of the metropolitans. There are 520 public-houses and 147 beer and wine houses in the district. The police force of the city of London is formed into six divisions. The headquarters are in the Old Jewry, and there are six station-houses within the city limits. The officers are on duty day and night, and the chief office and station houses are never closed. There is a committee of the board of aldermen on police affairs, exercising a supervision over the force. That a detached police force in the heart of the metropolis is at variance with the principle upon which the police is established in every other town in the kingdom few deny.

THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.

The metropolitan police district extends over the whole of the county of Middlesex (in which is the city of London), but the metropolitan police district does not include the city of London. It was established on the 29th of September, 1829. The metropolitan district also takes in the surrounding parishes of Surrey, Kent, Essex, and Hertford, and those also of which any part is not more than 15 miles, in a straight line, from Charing Cross. It is, therefore, a very large district, and is directly under the control of the chief commissioner. The population of the district, Dec. 31, 1878, was 4,534 010, with an area of 439 823, acres or 688 square miles; inhabited houses, 577,839. Col. Sir E. Y. Henderson, K. C. B., is the chief commissioner, with a residence and £3,800 per annum ($9 000). There are also two assistant commissioners at £800 each ($4,000), and a director of criminal investigation at £800 ($4,000) per annum. There is also a chief superintendent, who receives £800 ($4,000); four district superintendents, who pay is £725 per annum ($3,625), and 25 superintendents, whose pay ranges from £300 per annum ($1,500) to £475 ($2,375). Six hundred and two inspectors of the first class receive $15 62 each per week; 602 of the second class $13.87, and 786 sergeants $5.32 each. There are 8,397 constables (policemen) who pay is either $5 20, $5.14, or $5.08 per week. The authorized strength of the police this year—1880—was 10,477. Of these 9,206 were available for duty in the metropolis, consisting of 21 superintendents, 544 inspectors, 728 sergeants, and 7,913 constables. There are 20 divisions of the metropolitan police, with a force numbering from 150 to 700 men each. This does not include the dock-yard force at Woolwich, Portsmouth, Devonport, Chatham, and Pembroke, numbering over 1,200 officers and men. During the past year the growth of the city has necessitated the increase of the force by the appointment of 2 inspectors, 7 sergeants, and 51 constables.

A RETURN of offences other than agrarian in Ireland in 1880, presented to the House of Commons, shows that the total number of such offences was 3,084. Of these nineteen were murder and forty-four manslaughter. The total number of cases in all Ireland in which offenders were convicted was 694; the number of cases in which offenders were made amenable but not convicted, 420; the number of offenders awaiting trial is 155; the number of cases in which offenders were neither convicted nor made amenable, 1,815.

The American Love of Tobacco.

Whether or not a devotion to the "weed" is a necessary product of Republican liberty as developed on American soil, one of the golden apples, so to speak, which the tree of freedom, when tended so carefully as it is across the border, is sure to bring forth in all glorious magnificence, is a question which may be left to those who are fonder of solving such difficulties. Be the cause at any rate what it may, the fact still remains a more than usually stubborn and striking one, that the Americans are excessively fond of this product of nature, and in a form, too, which, in those who have not been "educated up" to the requisite standard of endurance, is sure to inspire disgust and positive repugnance. Whether it be a result of that state of things which Charles Dickens so ingeniously describes when he tells us he mistook a call to dinner for the alarm of fire, and people in their haste to "get back to business" bolt their food with too great rapidity, and too little regard to the convenience and abilities of their stomachs, and in consequence of their unreasonable haste are driven to seek some alleviation of the uncomfortable symptoms which by and by make their appearance; or whether in that eagerness which is so prominent a feature of American life at the present time, they are too abstemious in their manner of eating and drinking, and by a similar process of reasoning are led to a similar, though not precisely the same course of conduct as the newsboy who took his suet dumplings because they were "fillin;" or whether the custom be provocative of that mechanical ingenuity for which our neighbours are so justly proud, and so is prolonged to the furtherance of such praiseworthy ends; or whether the custom sprang simply from the natural craving which unemployed nervous energy has to expend itself on something, however trifling or even dirty that something may be; to enter into anything like an exhaustive discussion of such interesting and instructive matters as these, would require, according to the proverbial form of expression, not a mere essay, however long or short, but an entire volume. It may be that all these already mentioned are factors in that dexterity in the use of tobacco for which Americans are everywhere so conspicuously famous, or it may be that none of them are. It may be simply a sign and symbol of exuberant freedom, an evidence of the great doctrine that

TO AMASS A FORTUNE

ONE MAN IS AS GOOD AS ANOTHER, or even, in fact a great deal better if he has only impudence proportionate to his vanity, and an earnest of the fact that every man is entitled to the utmost possible liberty of action so long as he does not interfere with the law of the land. It is a blessing to many in affording scope for the exercise of skill and energy which might otherwise be allowed to lie altogether dormant. Who will deny that the time which has been occupied in learning to keep the "quid" in the proper position in the mouth, so as to hinder as little as possible the free exercise of the organs of speech, in rolling it round in such a way as to extract the utmost of nutriment and inspiration, while at the same time imparting to the countenance the requisite expression of a mean between far-seeing intelligence, and vacuous imbecility, and, last but not least, in acquiring that skill in propulsion, that accurate judgment of distance by the eye, and steadiness of aim, which is so provocative of large admiration and no little envy; who will deny that that time might have been otherwise, and shall we say, more injuriously, spent? No! No! we say. Let liberty flourish, and let

TOBACCO-CHEWING,

as an industry and a fine art on American soil, never, never die! What visitor to the great Republic has not wondered at and admired the truly democratic impartiality with which the devotees of the "weed" distribute their attentions. Sidewalks, walls of houses, windows, ceilings, floors of offices, warehouses, houses even, fences, porches, door-steps, railings, monuments, gravestones, cars, omnibuses, boats, steamers, everything is a mark and a receptacle, and if American marksmen are not the best in the world it is from no want of constant practice both by day and night. To do the "gentlemen" simple justice however, it must be said that this "diversion" is not a usual one during the hours of slumber. This may be the case with the more hardened and experienced veterans, but the vast majority before retiring for the night eject their pellet into vacancy, without caring very much where it may alight. This is the universal custom among them if the "quid" has been exhausted of all nourishment before bedtime, and of all those who are well to do, or extravagant, in any case; but of such as are prudent and careful, whether from necessity or choice, the usual plan is, if the mouthful is not yet fully accounted for when bedtime comes, to remove from the cheek as carefully as possible, lick it gently with the tongue all round so as not to waste any of the valuable moisture which may still adhere to its surface, press it very very carefully and not at all roughly between two pieces of blotting-paper, dry it thoroughly, and set aside till next morning. There are numerous variations to this plan of procedure no doubt, but this is the general rule, any departures are due to merely local prejudices or traditions. This national custom is truly democratic in that it is not confined to any one class of society, but is widespread, indeed ubiquitous, in the influence it exerts on all sorts and conditions of men. Smokers are numerous enough, as indeed they are everywhere, but smoking is not so exclusively an American national custom, as chewing is; and chewers are, as might be expected, legion, while spitters are like the sand that is upon the sea-shore, or the stars in the sky, or the leaves of the trees, that cannot be numbered for multitude. Everybody chews, and everybody spits,—the august Senator, terrible and majestic in his profundity, and filled with enthusiastic conceptions of what is due to the dignity of his own personality, and of the elevated order to which he has the honour to belong; the 'cute and who, yes Sirree, you bet, is fitted to run the mill of the whole creation at any time when there happens to be occasion for his services, the learned judge upon the bench, the lawyer pleading at the bar, and the prisoner before it, the minister of the gospel, the doctor, and the printer's diavolus, all sharpen their wits, enlighten their understandings, steady their nerves it may be, and, "in idea," at any rate, keep up the manly exercises of archery and rifle-shooting by incessant practice at butts more or less accessible and convenient, both to themselves and to others, though at the same time also to the no small detriment of their teeth and prolongation of their visages. These latter inconveniences however, are not for a moment to be set against the pleasure and desirableness of producing at least the show of wisdom though the reality may be far enough away. Having recently some leisure time to spend in one of the largest cities of one of the foremost States in the Union, we dropped into a court-room where a man was on trial for his life. We were met at the door by a withered and shrivelled up old man who did not seem to have thrived very well at his favorite exercise, though he still clung lustily to it with what few teeth he had yet remaining. Being too late for a seat, this

THE DELICATE MORSEL

INTELLECTUAL CONGRESSMAN

CANDIDATE FOR THE MAYORALTY,

as he assured us he was, insisted on our making our way behind and among a dense mass of men, nearly every one of whom was either sternly at work in seeking to bring a fresh piece of stubborn tobacco into due subjection, or having succeeded in that desirable pursuit, was ruminating comfortably thereupon, digesting the knotty evidence, and the subjugated morsel, at the same time, with an air which was evidently a heart-break and despair to numerous smallish boys who had come there for lessons in wisdom and manhood. Strange as it may appear, the manner in which the "quid" is acted upon, and the ability to "squirt" its juice both straight and far, are in some circles, the tests by which a man is tried, and his fitness to move in the innermost or more remote spheres of social intercourse, resolutely determined. One young man behind us awoke our admiration by the intense earnestness with which he applied himself to the great end of life; we were in some alarm for our continuations, owing to the densely packed state of the room, and the necessity always laid upon excessive energy to relieve itself. To do him justice however, when the moment for expectoration came, he always glanced downwards before perpetrating the act. Having at length got to the front we looked about for the judge, the prisoner, the lawyer, etc. They were all seated as in the custom there. The judge we at first mistook for a reporter. He was sitting at one end of a long desk, and was busy taking notes. By and by he got interested in a large book which looked like a Walker's dictionary, and presently

THE BEST RE...
FOR
Diseases of the Throat and Lungs.

In diseases of the pulmonary organs a safe and reliable remedy is invaluable. AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL is such a remedy, and no other so eminently merits the confidence of the public. It is a scientific combination of the medicinal principles and curative virtues of the finest drugs, chemically united, of such power as to insure the greatest possible efficiency and uniformity of results. It strikes at the foundation of all pulmonary diseases, affording prompt relief and rapid cures, and is adapted to patients of any age or either sex. Being very palatable, the youngest children take it readily. In ordinary Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Bronchitis, Influenza, Clergyman's Sore Throat, Asthma, Croup, and Catarrh, the effects of AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL are magical, and multitudes are annually preserved from serious illness by its timely and faithful use. It should be kept at hand in every household for the protection it affords in sudden attacks. In Whooping-cough and Consumption there is no other remedy so efficacious, soothing, and helpful.

Low prices are inducements to try some of the many mixtures, or syrups, made of cheap and ineffective ingredients, now offered, which, as they contain no curative qualities, can afford only temporary relief, and are sure to deceive and disappoint the patient. Diseases of the throat and lungs demand active and effective treatment; and it is dangerous experimenting with unknown and cheap medicines, from the great liability that these diseases may, while so trifled with, become deeply seated or incurable. Use AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL, and you may confidently expect the best results. It is a standard medical preparation, of known and acknowledged curative power, and is as cheap as its careful preparation and fine ingredients will allow. Eminent physicians, knowing its composition, prescribe it in their practice. The test of half a century has proven its absolute certainty to cure all pulmonary complaints not already beyond the reach of human aid.

SMILES.

The editor man sat lonely and grim
In his room up near the sky,
And never a hint of his terrible rage
Could be seen in his deep blue eye.

With pencil and scissors he toiled away
Nor looked from his paper up,
But his soul was seared with an anguish wild,
And on gore he could calmly sup.

Beneath the shirt-front so snowily white
Reposed a rubble-stone heart,
For the editor man was reading a piece
Which he tersely described as "tart."

"Dod-rot the darn poets!" he fiercely said,
"With their soul-songs and other gush;
If I had my way I would sink their stuff
Along with the fishery slush."

A fair-haired maid stepped softly in,—
The editor's girl, I ween,
Full quickly he looked from the manuscript up—
"Ah, 'tis you, my heart's own queen."

The editor-men have pretty tough times,
And often their bones do ache;
But in winning the hearts of the maidens fair,
The editors capture the cake.

More Truth Than Poetry.

Father, tell me what are Editors?
Are they men, or beasts of prey?
I heard some one say, their creditors
Kept them in ambush, night and day.

Alas, how soon the hours are over,
Counted us out to play the lover!
And how much narrower is the stage
Allotted us to play the sage!
But when we play the fool, how wide
The theatre expands! beside,
How long the audience sit before us;
How many prompters, what a chorus!

To which she answered, with her gaze fixed on a far-off mass of castellated clouds: "No, George; I'd let you fly away, and then I'd have all the rest I wanted here."

Did you ever see a woman slip down? Of course you never looked, but then you've seen them. Jack Chiddy.

A True Incident of the Rail.

Brave Jack Chiddy! Oh, well you may sneer,
For the name isn't one that sounds nice in the ear;
But a name is a sound—nothing more—deeds are best,
And Jack had the soul of a man in his breast.

Now, I heard you say that you're fond of a tale
If it bears upon railway men and the rail.
Well, here is one that will suit you, I know,
Though it happened a good many years ago.

Jack Chiddy—there you are smiling again
At the name, which I own is both common and plain—
Jack Chiddy, I say, wrought along with the mates,
Year in and year out on a section of plates.

Simple enough was the work, with no change
But to see that both lines were in gauge and range;
Fasten a key there, and tighten a bolt,
All to keep fast trains from giving a jolt.

Strange when one thinks where a hero may rise,
Say at times, in a moment, before our eyes,
Or right from our side ere we know it, and do
The work of a giant-and pass from our view.

But the story? you say. Well, I'm coming to that,
Though I wander a little—now, where was I at?
Let me see. Can you catch, shining round and clear,
The mouth of the Bramlington tunnel from here?

You see it! Well, right on the bank at the top,
When stacking some blocks, all at once, down the slope
A huge slab of stone from the rest shore its way,
And fell down on the up-line of metals and lay.

One sharp cry of terror burst forth from us all,
As we saw the huge mass topple over and fall,
We stood as if bound to the spot, dumb of speech,
Reading horror and doubt in the faces of each.

Then one of our mates snatched a glance at his watch,
Gave a start and a look that made each of us catch
At our breath, and a cry, that thrilled our hearts through.
"My God! the 'Flying Dutchman' is overdue!"

Hark, straight from over the hill we can hear
A dull, dead sound coming straight to the ear,
Then a short, sharp whistle that told with its blast
That the "Dutchman" was into the tunnel at last

And there on the rail lay that huge mass of stone.
And the "Dutchman" behind coming thundering on;
In a minute or less he would come with a dash,
And a hundred lives would be lost in the crash.

"Now, for your life, Jack!" for Chiddy had flown
Down the bank, and three leaps brought him close to the stone.
Not for his own life, for wife and child's sake.
Thought he, but the hundreds that now were at stake.

'Twas the work of a moment. With terrible strength
And a heave of the shoulder the slab moved at length—
Slipp'd clear off the rail—when, half muffled in smoke,
From the mouth of the tunnel the "Dutchman" broke.

There was one sharp whistle, a roar, and a crash
Of wheels ringing clear on the rail, and a flash
Of coiling smoke, and a glitter and gleam
Of iron and steel, and then down fell the steam.

Not a breath could we draw, but stood blank with dismay
As the train tore along, making up for delay;
Till at last from us all burst a shout and a cheer,
When we knew that the "Dutchman" had pass'd and was clear.

And Chiddy? Ah me! you will pardon these tears,
For he was my mate on the rails many years.
When we found him, one look was enough to reveal
That Jack's life's-blood was red on the engine-wheel.

Brave Jack Chiddy! Now you don't sneer
At the name which I own is but harsh to the ear;
But a name is a sound—nothing more—deeds are best,
And Jack had the soul of a man in his breast.

HIS VICTORIA CROSS

By the Author of "A STRANGE WEDDING-EVE," "CLARE STANHOPE'S DIAMONDS," &c.

'It's a falsehood—a base falsehood!" cried Cecil sharply; her blood bounded in her veins, and mounted to her brow, while her eyes flashed. "It is not true—it cannot be true."

"But it is," said Alice vehemently. "Mr. Fairleigh said every one knew it; he was surprised that we had not heard; but, of course, Colonel McLeod takes care we sha'n't hear. That's why he keeps us mewed up here like nuns. Fairleigh showed me a history of the Mutiny, and it's there in black and white—only mentioned, you know—and he said Lord Kennedy knew it and——"

"Hush—hush! Don't, Alice; for pity's sake, be quiet!" said Cecil, in a voice of such keen anguish that it disconcerted the younger girl.

Cecil turned and pressed her hands to her hot temples. She kept repeating to herself with white lips—

"It is not true—it cannot be true—there must be some mistake—yet—yet——"

Was this the clue to his suffering? Was this the explanation of his manner that day? Was this what he had meant when he told her of her father's "trust" in him? And then there came a gleam of light across the darkness; her father had believed in him. Why, then there must have been some error. Courts-martial were not infallible, nor even the Horse Guards.

"Alice," she said quickly, turning round once more and dropping her hands to lock them tightly together, "Colonel McLeod must have meant this—what you tell me—when he said that our father trusted him; he said it to me; twice he has done so; he alone believed in him when the world censured. So, Alice, there must be some error. Don't you see?"

"No, I don't see," answered Alice shortly. "Papa was partial, I dare say; it's not likely that everybody was wrong and papa right—a court-martial too."

"But you say their sentence was reversed. They can be wrong then."

"Oh, well, perhaps there was interest! How should we know? How odd you look, Cecil!"

"Never mind me," returned Cecil, with an impatience rare to her. "What was it he said was done?"

"Fairleigh? Oh, Colonel McLeod had to hold some place that he didn't hold! And so the Sepoys got in, and there was a frightful massacre; only the Colonel and a few were saved, because reinforcements came up. I shouldn't like to be Colonel McLeod, that's all!" concluded the Colonel's ward thankfully.

"There is more nobility, bravery, and loyalty in Colonel McLeod's soul, Alice," said Cecil deliberately, "than you would ever attain to if you lived a life of prayer and penance! Do you never remember that we should have been penniless and alone in the world but for his generosity? Have you no thought for the unwearied kindness he has shown us here, the countless benefits he has loaded us with? No, it's of no use crying, Alice; tears are not feeling. You can cry for an hour, but you are just as selfish and shallow at the end as you were at the beginning."

Cecil spoke with a bitterness she had never before shown nor indeed felt. Then she left the room; she was trembling from head to foot, profoundly excited by the passion of feeling aroused within her. Her first idea was to go at once to the Colonel and ask him to tell her the truth; but then, she told herself, it would be an additional agony to him to think that this story was known to the children of Albert Verner. No, she would not go to him; she must remain in suspense as to the truth of the story.

Never before had Cecil known what it was to go through such an evening as she passed that day, bearing a burden to which she was unaccustomed, trying to seem her usual self, and failing. She said she had a headache, and, under that plea, she sat throughout that wretched evening in a low chair by the fire-side, holding a screen, as if to shield her from the light, while Alice played chess with Mrs. Annandale. Colonel McLeod did not come into the drawing-room. He had sent a message, asking to be excused from joining them at dinner; he had business, he said; and Hector, who delivered the message, added that the Colonel had ordered his horse not long after Lord Kennedy had left, and had ridden out alone.

"Lord Kennedy has been here then?" said Mrs. Annandale; but Cecil made no answer. What news had Lord Kennedy brought to give a fresh shock to Loris McLeod?

The Colonel had to go into Hyde early the next morning. He saw Cecil for a moment or two, and greeted her in his usual grave, half-tender manner, which made her tremble with a strange vague feeling that was half dread, half hope of she knew not what. But he said not a word of what had passed the day before. Perhaps it pained him to think that other eyes had looked upon his suffering.

In the afternoon Cecil was practising, or trying to practise, in the library. She thought she was still absent, and would not return until later; but the Colonel came in and went straight to her side. She started up, flushing from cheek to brow in confusion.

"I thought you were out still," she said a little hurriedly, "or I should not have come here. Forgive me."

"You were made free of the library long ago, my child," replied Colonel McLeod, with a grave, sweet smile; "but I want you for a little time, Cecil, if you can spare it to me."

"I am not busy; and, if I were, my time is yours," she said.

She locked her hands tightly together, trembling a little inwardly, and in wondering silence took the low chair he brought forward for her.

"I am going," said the Colonel, taking up his favourite position by the mantelpiece, "to speak to you, my child, on a subject that may startle you perhaps a little. You have no mother or father, so I must stand in their place; and with you it is best to come at once to the point. Lord Kennedy came to see me yesterday"—he saw her start and raise her eyes quickly to his face; then they dropped again. "He asked my permission to become a suitor for your hand."

He had expected the girl to be startled, agitated, bewildered at the intelligence, which would probably come upon her as something new and strange; but he was not prepared for the shock his words seemed to give her. She sprang towards him and put out her hands with incoherent words, and an almost wild entreaty in her large eyes.

"No, no—I cannot—I never thought—oh, Colonel McLeod, don't say I must think of that—don't let him take—take me from——"

She bowed her face on his arm in a fit of uncontrollable weeping; and for a moment the Colonel stood quite silent, looking down on the trembling form, on the shapely head, and on the silken curls that swept his hand. What was the cause of this terrible agitation? Cecil was not weak, nor a girl to indulge in tears on the slightest occasion; and yet now she was weeping passionately. His lips moved; he bent down in mute agony for a second, then raised his head once more firmly, and laid one hand on the girl's head with infinite tenderness.

"My child, my child, dry your tears! You must not think I would ask you to do anything for which you had no inclination. What is it, Cecil, that troubles you so much?"

It was some moments before the girl could control herself; and then she whispered brokenly—

"Forgive me, please—forgive me! I ought not to be so foolish. I will be calm now. I am so sorry."

"Dear child, there is no need," said the Colonel gently. "I fear this is but a rude awakening from your happy childhood!" He half sighed, but spoke again—"Can you listen to me now, Cecil?"

"Yes," answered the girl in a low tone, with face averted.

"Forgive me the question, my child. Had you no thought, no vague idea even, why Lord Kennedy has come so often of late?"

"No. I thought he was your friend, Indeed, indeed I never meant to deceive him, to let him think I cared for him—as he wishes," said Cecil, low and earnestly.

"But you might learn to love him, my child?"

"No, no—never," whispered Cecil. Something seemed to be striving to find utterance from her heart. She wanted to say that she would never leave him to loneliness and gloom—now less than ever; but she could not find words.

A thrill of unutterable joy passed through Loris McLeod.

"Listen, Cecil," he said, with a quietness that dare not stray into one tender word. "You are very young now; you are almost, I think, in feeling a child. Can you truly gauge what your heart may feel when the thought of love and marriage is less strange to you? Can you send a man, who loves you well, from you, without even a hope that he may one day win you? Remember, Cecil, I don't want to urge you in any way; your own heart must be your guide; but I say that, if you can love Lord Kennedy, he will make you happy. I want you not lightly to cast aside a love that is very true and earnest; you hold a man's life in this little hand, Cecil."

His voice faltered and failed; he drew in his breath quickly; he could scarcely bear the clinging touch of that little hand; he could not utter another word, although bitter self-reproach was stinging him. Had he been true to his trust?

Presently Cecil raised her head and pushed back the thick wavy hair from her forehead. She said half dreamily, as though speaking more to herself than to him—

"A man's life in this hand? Will he care so very much? Is it true that women have such power? Colonel McLeod," she said wistfully, "if I said that I did not care for him now as he wished, but allowed him to think I might do so in a little time—a year or two—he would hope, would he not, and think I should not send him away again?"

"What then, Cecil?"

"That would be deceiving him. Please bear with me, Colonel McLeod. I know I am only a young girl," said Cecil pleadingly—but there was in her tone a resolution, a clear comprehension of what she was saying, that assured him she spoke deliberately—"but in this I know I shall never change. I shall never love Lord Kennedy as he would wish his wife to love him. I like him—I have been very happy when he has come; but that is so different from any feeling one ought to have for the man one must look up to above every other. I am so sorry, oh, so sorry! Do you want me very much to marry Lord Kennedy?"

Her wistful eyes looked up to his, seeking an answer and appealing to him with pathetic pleading. How could he give the lie to that love throbbing in his heart—how say the words that would influence her perhaps to strive painfully to please him? For he knew that Cecil spoke the truth; she would never give her heart, her life unreservedly, to the man who had asked these of her. She must have seen the gray pallor that came to his face, the convulsive quiver of his white lips. With a last effort of self-control he turned aside, folding his arms tightly over his breast; and the girl flushed and shrank back.

"If you can be happy!" he muttered hoarsely.

For one moment after that Cecil stood absolutely still, her eyes turned with a startled, half-bewildered, questioning look on him. And in that brief space of time a sharp revulsion came to Loris McLeod. He knew that a moment's weakness had almost caused the betrayal of that which he had exerted every power of his will to keep secret. He was doubly bound in honour. And honour was the guiding star of his life; all else might fail him—there was only that left to cling to. Should that go too? He raised his face once more, deathly white, but set in an unalterable resolve. He did not look towards the girl, who started, as if from a dream, when she heard the soft voice, quiet with the intensity of inward emotion.

"Your own heart must guide you, Cecil," he said, as though that had been all his answer to her appeal. "You must not think of me in this decision; only be sure of what that decision must be."

He could hear her quick irregular breathing, could hear her hands clasped and unclasped; he dared not trust himself to meet her eyes.

At length she spoke, low and hurriedly, moving away as she did so.

"I cannot give him hope. I shall never change. Tell him—ask him to forgive me. I did not mean to deceive him. Must I—must I see him?"

"No, my child, unless you would wish."

"No—oh, no!" She shrank in terror from the thought, scarcely herself understanding how much this shrinking was due to a wild fear that he might divine something she must hide from every eye. "May I go now?" she half whispered; and, hardly heeding the answer, she went out from his presence mechanically.

CHAPTER VII.

Day after day passed slowly and heavily to Loris McLeod. The additional burden of the love which might have been the crown and glory of his life—but which, coming now, reached him too late—was almost more than he could sustain. And yet he was used to endurance. He had always had his burden to bear; but it had never seemed heavier than now, when he had to meet Cecil day after day, to do battle hourly with the temptation to take, if it might be, the happiness that lay at his door; to keep ever before his yearning eyes that stern code of honour by which he had lived, and at least to keep that honour stainless.

Yet outwardly there was no change in his manner to Cecil Verner. True, he rarely, as before, went out with her for those long rides or walks which had been wont to make up the pleasure of his life. He had, he said, little time, when Alice asked him once why he had given them up.

Cecil studied harder than ever in those winter days; and Mrs. Annandale said she grew pale and nervous, and had lost some of her bright merry ways. She wondered if she had loved Lord Kennedy, and if Colonel McLeod had raised obstacles and parted them.

To Cecil the hard lesson of endurance she must practise now came as something new and strange. She knew that somehow there was a change in her inner self. She looked out no longer with a child's wonder on the world. There was a vague unrest on her spirit. Why could she not go in the old way to the library, she wondered, as Loris McLeod sat writing or reading, and put her hand on his shoulder and see him look up with that sweet and tender smile? Why was there a slight cloud between them, a shrinking restraint she strove in vain to cast off when in his presence? Yet Cecil felt that she could be quite her old self if she might only have knelt at his feet and laid her head down and felt his gentle hand rest lightly on her brow.

So passed the dark winter days—anxious days for many English hearts, for the air was laden with war news from South Africa.

Then suddenly there came the awful tidings of the fatal field of Isandula, and the glorious defence of Rorke's Drift. Almost before the call was made for reinforcements, men came forward to volunteer, and first among those who so volunteered was Loris McLeod. He did it without hope, only with a passionate prayer that this time he might not be denied. For now it seemed impossible to bear this life he led. He felt that his self-control must fail him soon. He could see that in some way Cecil was changed, that some trouble lay on her heart. Was it that she had mistaken her feelings with regard to Lord Kennedy, and that his absence had shown her clearly now that she loved him? The Colonel tried to force himself to think this might be true; yet his own heart dared to whisper another story.

At Hyde conjecture and eager questioning were rife. Were the —th Lancers going out? Of course the Colonel would go then. Nothing was known. No orders had come from head-quarters as yet. Both officers and men were eager to be sent out; and, at the mess, in barracks, indeed everywhere a Lancer's uniform was to be seen, there was but one topic of conversation—the war, and the chances of taking part in it.

In silence Colonel McLeod waited—in suspense that was an agony. He had not said even to Cecil what he had done. She knew that he must have volunteered, because she knew him so well. But as he had not spoken on the subject, she shrank in her new shyness of him from seeking a confidence he had not volunteered.

One afternoon Cecil entered the library to fetch a book. It was one of the days on which Colonel McLeod's duties always took him into Hyde, whence he rarely returned till late. She thought he was still absent. She had not ventured into that room of late. She paused therefore with a start when, on entering, she saw that the library was not tenantless. But the shock was not at the sight of him she half dreaded to meet, but at the attitude, the whole appearance of the man, which betokened something so like despair.

He sat, with his arms crossed on the table, his head resting on them, perfectly still; yet the bowed form told of suffering before which the girl's half-trembling fear vanished, the woman's noble impulse to soothe and strengthen filling her heart. She had no thought of herself, of all the doubts and self-communing that had destroyed her peace of late. She simply knew that he suffered, and that for him she would have braved even death, if that might save him from pain.

With light gentle footfall she came to his side, and then paused, shrinking from wounding him afresh by intruding on his anguish. Yet, soft as had been her step, he must have heard it, or was instinctively conscious of her presence; for he raised his head and looked up, with only a dim consciousness that it was Cecil who had come to him. Her coming might be an additional sting; but the greater pain had swallowed up the lesser for a time. Then he dropped his head again and said slowly—

"Why do you come to see my humiliation?"

She bent forward, deathly pale, with a sinking heart—the word struck her sharply.

"There is none," she said in a low tone.

"What is it?" What has happened? Oh, Colonel McLeod, tell me—in pity tell me!"

His breast heaved, and his hands tightened their clasp together.

"There is no atonement—none!" he muttered hoarsely. "Twenty long years cannot expiate it, twenty years of patience cannot blot out one false step. They will not give me even the chance to redeem a dishonoured name. Oh, Heaven, the dishonour was not mine—not mine!"

Trembling, awe-struck, the girl heard those words. A few weeks before they would have sounded without meaning to her; now she read them by the light of a later knowledge. She saw at once all that had fallen on him, how his last hope had been crushed. She had scarcely need to read the official letter he half pushed towards her. It only said, with one exception, what had been said to many others, that it was found impossible to accept the services of all who had tendered them. The exception lay in the last words, that Colonel McLeod's request to be permitted to volunteer even in the ranks could not be entertained.

Hot tears rushed to Cecil's eyes and fell upon her hand. It seemed to her a cruel thing to deny to him all hope of winning back a stainless name. He asked to go out, not in his own rank, but to waive all rank and position, and serve in any way. No; he had been censured. Perhaps graver suspicions had lain behind that censure, and Loris McLeod was "not known" at head-quarters.

Once more the low passionate voice spoke. The deep reserve of years had broken down before the on-rushing of the flood. Perhaps he scarcely heeded that he was not alone; yet there could have been no bitterness for him in Cecil's presence, else he would have recalled to himself even in this agony how bare he was laying all the wounds of his heart.

"Have I failed these twenty years in any service? Have I been unwilling to bear the censure that seemed to them just? If"—he rose now and paced the room, locking his hands so tightly that the blue veins stood out like cords—"if I had been verily guilty of all and everything that had been charged to me, is it just thus to make oblivion an impossibility? I asked not mercy or generosity, but bare justice; and that, as a mercy, if I may not live for England, at least—at least that I might die in her service. But I must endure, and still endure through years yet to come; and, still enduring, die—my grave dishonoured, my name stained to the last!"

He covered his face, shivering from head to foot.

"What am I to do now with this life that is left me?" he said, sweeping his hand across his forehead, and brushing back the waves of hair. "I had thought I was inured at last to inactivity, could bear to live on day after day in a dead monotony; but that is broken up. How shall I bind myself again to a double yoke?"

He sat down again to his old position, but stretched out his right hand as if, in very helplessness, seeking strength of which he was bereft, and his voice sank to a whisper.

"Cecil, Cecil, come to me! You are young and noble; you have not exhausted the well-springs of your life. Tell me how I may still live bravely and patiently."

She sprang to him and knelt beside him, her tears falling fast on the hand she clasped in hers. She could speak no word. Her passionate impulsive nature was moved to its very depths. It startled him, this bitter weeping that shook her slender form. It seemed to awaken him as if from a dream, to restore to him in part that self-control so swept aside that he had taken no thought of what he said, had forgotten all but the terrible agony, the keen sense of a bitter injustice. But now he bent over her and strove to force back the deep tender love that would thrill in every tone of his voice.

"My child, my poor child, forget, forgive my madness, my weakness! I have startled you with words that should never have passed my lips. Cecil, do not give me the additional reproach that I have suffered the shadows of my life to fall on yours."

"No, no," she said, almost inarticulately—"not reproach. Oh, if I might bear it all for you!"

"Heaven forbid!" he said quickly. "Your name is free from stain, dishonour; mine——"

A Sunken Island in Lake Michigan.

(Sturgeon Bay Expositor.)

From Mrs. Josephine Graham we learn some particulars concerning the so-called "sunken island" in the vicinity of Port du Morts (Death's Door). Mrs. Graham states that the island was situated in Lake Michigan, about five miles southeast of Rock Island, and known as "Little Gull," because of its whiteness and appearance of a gull at long range. The island was irregular in shape, being about fifty feet in width by one hundred feet in length; was entirely a formation made of small stones, ranging from the size of a walnut to rocks weighing several pounds. By no means was the island a place of vegetation, for not even grass grew upon it. In the summer of 1846 or 1847 Mr. Graham built a fish shanty or house on "Little Gull," to be handier to his nets that were set "outside." Into the small fish palace, on the island of sea pebbles, Mrs. Graham went and cooked for her husband during the summer months, but, as fall approached and old Michigan began to froth, the inhabitants of "Little Gull" returned to Rock Island, where terra firma was more extended. The next season Little Gull was too small to even "squat" on—having diminished a good deal during the winter. It continued to grow smaller each year, and long years ago disappeared below the surface of the water. Then the spot was referred to as the "outside shoal." Still the work of "going down" continued, and small sail crafts of light draft could navigate over the shoal. A few years ago the water over the shoal was of a depth sufficient to hide the appearance of a shoal, and a large steamer suffered a heavy loss by grounding on the bar. To-day the once dry island is covered by fathoms of water. By the superstitious it is claimed that the disappearance of Little Gull island is a mystery, and that the neighboring islands have also settled a number of feet. Landmarks prove the latter statement untrue, while the mystery connected with the "sunken island" does not seem to be be difficult to solve. The fact that the little island was entirely formed of small stones—unquestionably heaped up by the sea—it does not seem unreasonable to suppose that the same power that rolled the stones up could also level or roll them down again.

A Runaway Train.

(Las Vegas (N. M.) Optic.)

The most hair-raising episode that ever happened to a New Mexican mountain railway train fell to the lot of Conductor Blessingham Thursday afternoon at 3 o'clock, on the west slope of Glorietta summit. The train comprised nearly thirty loads, and as it entered upon the descent, Jake Brown, the engineer, threw on the water brake, but found that it was broken and would not work. The train gained momentum to such a frightful extent that the switch-cables and hooks lying on the pilot base in front were hurled from their place into the air, breaking one of the locomotive's guard-rails. Brown called for brakes, but the train men had already set every one, and realized that the train was beyond their control. Seeing that nothing could be done to stop the mad course the train was running, Brown jumped from the cab while going at the rate of sixty miles an hour, and landed seventy two feet distant, actual measurement. Blessingham, who was on the caboose with Pawnee Charley and wife as passengers, fearing that the train was going to destruction, cut his way-car loose, and checked it with the brakes, while the train continued its velocity down the long grade. The fireman stood at his post like a hero, and while the engine was plunging down the flight at a giddy speed, he crawled out on the foot-board and poked sand through the sand-box, thinking that it might assist the wheels in getting a grip upon the rails. As the train sped around Material curve, which is "short and steep," the velocity was so great that the locomotive ran on one rail, and overbalanced so greatly that it came within an ace of losing its equilibrium. The brakemen on deck were obliged to lie flat and cling to the running-boards for safety. For six miles those badly-frightened men stuck to the ship and faced the horrors of death. Below Concito is a natural basin, with three miles of level track, and it was on this stretch—the runaway train was mastered and stopped. Some of the cars were laden with iron for the front, but they were unloaded before the train stopped by the material being hurled in all directions. Just how the train held to the rails as well as it did is a mystery which the philosophers must solve—we can't.

The Influence of Poe.

(London News.)

Poe, like Pope, threw himself into a war with dunces. He hit and thrust at them vigorously, he exposed a score of cheap popularities, he was merciless to the inexpensive reputations then readily acquired by every tootler on the whistle of Miss Eliza Cook. Since the time of Poe American literature has wonderfully advanced in the acquisition of force and of polish. American novelists, for example, almost gives us lessons in elaboration of style, in reticence, and in well-calculated effects. American poets are, perhaps, too numerous. That they get a hearing, as they do, and appeal to a really large public, says much for the interest of the people in contemporary verse. In form, in the mere art of versifying, even the minor American poets of to-day show wonderful versatility and deftness. Commonplace is much less successful than it was of old. In fiction, analysis is almost too careful. We can not but think that this rapid ripening of the American Muse (who was a raw, unformed school-girl in the lifetime of Poe) is due in part to the influence of that critic. His method is as unlike the method of Mr. Matthew Arnold as possible. But he exercised the same kind of influence. Like Mr. Arnold, he introduced some tinge of French thought and of French literature into the workmanship of his countrymen. Perhaps be was not a wide reader, and the element of affectation in his nature may be detected in his quotations of obscure Latin authors in his oriental allusions. It is hard to say how much knowledge was implied in these allusions—how rich the mine was from which Poe dug these sparkling fragments. Still, he judged the writers of his own country with some knowledge of other literatures. As he was quite ruthless in his criticisms he did good, but at his own cost.

A provoking mistake—(Charlie, his sister Grace and her friend are skating together on the pole grounds.) Charlie—"This way of crossing arms is really very confusing." Grace (after a moment's pause)—"Stop squeezing my hand, Charlie."

An Irish Romance.

When I arrived at Kilmurray, one of those storms which come from the Atlantic, and in an instant envelop the islands in a cloud of wind-driven mist, made me seek refuge in a cabin. It was a crowded busy peasant's home, and as I sat by the fire—the warmest seat being given me with the invariable hospitality of these people—I found abundant material for observation and reflection. Whatever cleanliness was possible in a family of eight occupying one huge room along with two pigs was carefully maintained; at least, the mother and the children were neatly and comfortably attired, the earth well swept, and the pigs were confined to the limits assigned them. An old woman was carding wool, a child rocking the cradle, and the mother spinning at the wheel. The chickens, also driven in by the rain, one by one hopped up the ladder to their roosts among the rafters, from which they watched over their ruffled feathers the busy family and the blazing hearth with so much approval and satisfaction that I am sure, if chickens be susceptible to emotion, these were very tender ones indeed. A dog sneaked in, and seeing a stranger, went out into the rain again. The dogs, which are not numerous on the islands, are of the most miserable and condemned aspect, and seems to feel their ignoble ancestry, as they invaribly jumped over a wall or ran into some obscurity on the approach of a stranger. While drying my dripping garments, I saw for the first time, seated in a corner, as if to screen himself from observation, the figure of a young man clad in white flannel, the costume of the island. His face was thin and sad, and of the same color as the garments he wore, and he gazed at the fire with such a dejected and hopeless expression as led me to infer that he was the fated victim of some terrible disease—consumption, perhaps—and was feebly waiting through the long hours of the day and night the death he knew to be so sure and near. I spoke to him, striving in my pity to appear unconscious of perceiving his misery. Without answering he rose abruptly and left the cabin. The looks of concern and inquietude in the faces about me told me of some unusual sorrow, which the mother, leaving her spinning-wheel, explained to me in a low voice. She told me that the young man, her eldest son, poor Owney, as she called him, had until a month before been the most healthy and cheerful member of the family; ready and prompt at work, and the life of the household, when a letter came from America to a neighboring family inclosing money to pay the passage thither of their eldest daughter. It appeared that the young man had long entertained a secret passion for this girl, and when he heard that he probably would never see her again, he declared his love to her, and besought her to remain. So far from being unmindful of his affection, she avowed her willingness to marry at once, if he would accompany her to America immediately afterward. This was impossible; his own family was unable to assist him, and the few people who possess money on the island would not lend it without security. The practical damsel saw, on the other side of the Atlantic every prospect of improving her material condition, and doubted not that husbands were as plentiful there as elsewhere; while, if she remained, she knew the drudgery and hopeless slavery that were the lot of all around her would be hers also. Therefore she told her suitor if he would not accompany her she would not listen to his suit. When the young man found his upbraidings useless, he gave way to despair, and had not worked or spoken since his cruel sentence had been pronounced. Every day he grew thinner and more wan, and he did not partake of sufficent food to support life. All the solicitude and tenderness of his mother had not succeeded in arousing within him his former self, and with tears running down her cheeks she told me she thought he had lost his reason forever.

Some weeks previously the school-master had written for them to a priest, a distant relative of the family, who lived in Connemara; but they had received no reply, and she supposed he had neither help nor counsel to give. I pondered for a long while, as I sat by the fire, upon what often proves to be the unfortunate sincerity of men, and I could not refrain from deploring the no less frequent levity of my own sex. In passing through the village a week afterward I stopped to say good day to these kind people, when I found the house a scene of bustle and confusion. My erewhile love-sick swain was, when I entered, making himself a pair of pampootees; and as he bade me good day over a dangerously starched collar, his face glowed with health and energy. The now cheerful and happy mother informed me that since my last visit they had received a letter from the priest in Connemara, inclosing his blessing for her son, and the money to pay his passage to America. She had very busy knitting him stockings, and making him a fine white flannel suit to be married in, and which thereafter he would not again wear until his arrival at New York, so that he would make a decent appearance in the new world, as became the relative of a priest. He was to be married to the object of his choice the next day, and they were to start immediately afterward upon their long voyage. As I left, the damsel, whose month's delay to prepare her outfit had given such a fortunate respite to her lover, thrust her head inside the door, and calling upon Owney to be sure and wear the blue stockings she had knitted him to the chapel on the morrow; and then, with her little retrousse nose turned up to the sky ran blushing away.—J. L. Cloud, in Harper's Magazine for March.

Khalil Effendi's Death.

(From the London Telegraph.)

During the last hours of Khalil Effendi, the venerable Sheik-ul-Islam, who died a short time ago at Constantinople, twelve softas, stationed in his death chamber, were incessantly engaged in chanting chapters from the Koran, with the pious object of facilitating the passage of his soul from this world to the next. As soon as he had breathed his last, his six wives were admitted to his bedside, where they set up a piteous crying, beating their breasts the while, and continued to give expression to their grief in this dismal manner until removed by the eunuchs in order that Khalil's body might be prepared for its interment, which took place within seven hours of his death. After been bathed in perfumed water, the aged dignitary's corpse was enwrapped in the folds of a costly white turban which he had worn upon his head for thirty consecutive years previous to his decease. This, and this only, was Khalil's winding sheet, tightly swaddled in which his remains were borne to the cemetery upon the shoulders of four young softas, after the ninety virtues of Allah had been duly recited over his bier by the senior Ulemas of the Stamboul clergy. When the burial ceremony had been concluded, a funeral feast was held in the departed Sheik-ul-Islam, at which all the reverend personages who had taken part in the funeral were splendidly regaled. Khalil, who had held his high office for many years, and was greatly reverenced by the faithful, left a handsome fortune behind him to be equally divided among his many children.

Col. A. W. Drayson writes the London Daily News from Halifax, Nova Scotia, to announce that he has made an astronomical discovery, the result of ten years investigation. It is: "That the earth rotates annually once round a second axis, which second action is not coincident with the axis of daily rotation. This movement is due to she fact that, owing to the preponderance of land above the water in the northern hemisphere, and owing to the mass of land in Asia, Europe, and Africa on one side of the earth, the centre of gravity of the earth is not coincident with the centre of the earth, and, consequently, is not located in the plane of the equator. The results of the discovery are most important, as the changing positions of the stars from month to month can, by the aid of this discovery, be calculated, so that the endless observations of scores of computers at various observatories become no longer necessary."

At the marriage of Lord Brooke and Miss Maynard at Westminster Abbey, Prince Leopold takes the part of "best man."

A RETURN of offences other than agrarian in Ireland in 1880, presented to the House of Commons, shows that the total number of such offences was 3,084. Of these nineteen were murder and forty-four manslaughter. The total number of cases in all Ireland in which offenders were convicted was 694; the number of cases in which offenders were made amenable but not convicted, 420; the number of offenders awaiting trial is 155; the number of cases in which offenders were neither convicted nor made amenable, 1,815.

AN English authority says that reform is much needed in the American railway system as respects safety, speed, and punctuality. Straightening the lines and building them better, he thinks, would yield the desirable results.

The Elmira Advertiser thinks that pretty soon it will be cheaper to be cremated than to keep on living.

NOTICE.

[illegible]

THE D[illegible] prorogued, we [illegible] about the 18th inst.

THE Provincial Legislature was prorogued on Friday last, with the usual ceremonies.

EDWARD HANLAN returned home to Toronto on Friday last and received a right royal welcome. He was presented with a Tea Service valued at something in the neighborhood of $1000, a cheque for $500, a bronze clock and several other articles.

THE coroners' jury in the case of Mrs. Peter Bladsalls, of Lynden, Ont. returned a verdict of murder against the accused, for having caused the death of one Maggie McKay, by producing an abortion. It appears from the woman's own confession that she has been following this diabolical business for some years, with success, but like the "pitcher that goes often to the well gets broken" at last, so this wicked women has been caught in her nefarious business, and will have to pay the penalty of her crime.

JOHN GORDON Esq., after holding the position of President of the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway for over twelve years, last week tendered his resignation, which has been reluctantly accepted. W. H. Beatty Esq., the solicitor of the Company, has been elected to fill the vacancy thus caused. We do not think the Company could have made a better selection, as Mr. B's long connection with the road in the capacity of Solicitor has enabled him to get thoroughly posted in all matters connected with it, and no doubt that knowledge will be put to good advantage by the new President.

RAILWAY AID.

After cons[illegible] numberless int[illegible] deputations, [illegible] have granted ai[illegible] the following [illegible] roads.

1. The Ontario Sault Ste. Marie Railway from Gravenhurst to Sault Ste Marie, a distance of 300 miles at the rate of $2,850 per mile

2 The Erie and Huron Railway from Rondeau, on Lake Erie, to Dresden, a distance of 40 miles, at the rate of $2,000 per mile.

3 The Stratford and Lake Huron Railway from Harriston to Wiarton, a distace of 62 miles. at the rate of $2,000 per mile.

4. The first section of the Georgian Bay and Wellington Railway, from Mount Forest to Durham, a distance of 16 miles, at the rate of $1,500 per mile.

There is a good deal of dissatisfaction expressed at the government having discriminated against the Georgian Bay and Wellington railway in favor of the other roads. The following from the Grey Review hits the nail on the head exactly:—

"To say that withholding Provincial aid from the northern section of the Georgion Bay and Wellington Railway will be disastrous to the interests of Durham and the municipalities lying between Durham and Owen Sound, might seem somewhat hyperbolical, but, as there is no possibility of bulding the northern section of this line without Provincal aid, it is very evident, that by withholding Provincial aid now, those interests will be seriously injured and great injustice done to the ratepayers who have contributed towards the building of the road. It is possible that some connection may exist between this railway policy of the Ontario Government and a Bill which has just passed its third reading, to amalgamate the G. B. & W. R. and S. & L. H. R. Companies, the new company thus formed to be henceforth known as the Grand Trunk, Georgian Bay, and Lake Erie Railway Company. These lines will virtually become the property of the Grand Trunk, and it may well suit the interest of that corporation to make Durham the terminus of the Durham branch of the new line, in view of the facts that it has secured Wiarton as the terminus of the main line. But we submit, that Provincial aid to railways is suppose to be given in the interests of the people and not in the interests of railway companies, and that however the proposed arrangments may suit the Grand Trunk, it is a positive injury to the municipalities."

FIRE.—Last Saturday, the Rev. E Spencer, lot 1, con. 5, Keppel, met with a very serious loss by fire—his stable and contents, together with all his stock excepting one calf, being consumed. The disaster occurred while the family were at dinner, a[illegible] it was discovered, the stable [illegible] sheet of flames. Neighbours [illegible] promptly on the ground and as it was found impossible to save the burning building, which was near the dwelling, all efforts were directed to saving the latter, with success. The fire is supposed to have had its origin from some hot ashes which had been thrown out by the children a short time before. No insurance. As Mr. Spencer is held in high esteem, the neighbours called a meeting the following Monday, and, after expressing their sympathy for his misfortune, appointed the chairman and secretary to wait upon the rev. gentleman for the purpose of asking permission to replace some of the stock destroyed.—Echo.

John Merden, a farmer's boy living on the 8th concession of London township, is a selftaught taxidermist, and has a collection of 1,800 specimens. A very large proportion of these are native birds, which he captured and set up during leisure moments after his regular farm work was done.

NOTICE.—We wish it disinctly understood, that we do not hold ourselves reponsible for the opinions expressed by our correspondents.

To the Editor of the STANDARD,

SIR.—In perusing the Grey Review of the 13th of Jan'y, ult., I notice in the Dundalk items an article, over the signature of "Old Zero" in reference to municipal Election of Proton, stating that funds had been posted in the hands of Conductor Chambers, of the T., G. & B. R.'y for the purpose of betting on issue of such Election. It having been repeatedly intimated to me that I was the person referred to as C. C., and there being no other employee on the T., G. & B. R.'y of that I am the person the subject same name, I very naturally suppose of Old Z's. insinuations; and now, Sir, if such is the case, I emphatically deny the charge, and furthermore declare it to be a black falsehood. I am prepared to prove that I was in no way connected in pools, stakes, or bets on result of said election. It appears to me that O. Z. in dissimulating, wanted to whip some one else over my back—an action only worthy the meanest coward. His nom de plume was well chosen, for, as already stated, if he tried to play on me the doings of another, he is a mere cipher. From the tune of his palaver all through, one would imagine he had been in the employ of P. T. Barnum as chief clown, for the past decade. In conclusion I would say if I am the individual he styles C. C. I demand an apology; and if not let the palavering O. Z. explain. As he seems afraid to give his name, I will not follow his example. By giving the above publicity in your valuable paper, you will confer a favor on, yours Respectfully

W. H. CHAMBER, T., G & B R'y

Owen Sound, Feb, 28th, 1881.

P. S.—I sent a copy of the above letter on the 22nd ult., to the Editor of the Grey Review; but somehow or other it failed to appear in the columns of last weeks issue of that tiney little sheet.—W. H. C.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

SIR,—I observe in the STANDARD lately that you had been found fault with for committing a breach of political neutrality by inserting Mr. Sproule's spech in Parliament on the Syndicate question. You answer that the insertion was paid for was, in itself, complete; but even supposing that it had not been so paid for, surely it is the least we can expect of a local newspaper—political or non-polical—to give us a report of our local members speeches. How otherwise are many of us to become acquainted with our members views on public questions as they come up. My own political opinions and those of our sitting member do not accord on many points; but that is no reason why I, or any other Reformer, should be deprived of knowing as to how Mr. Sproule's are developing on public matters. Mr. Sproule was elected as a Conservative, chiefly by Conservatives; but once elected he is member for the whole riding, and I am sure that all really liberal Reformers will be glad at all times to peruse Mr. Sproule's utterances on public questions.

Yours,

REFORMER.

Mr. Hogg, Reve of the Town of Collingwood, has been unseated from want of sufficent property to qualify on.

SELF-DESTRUCTION.—James Gibson living on the 4th concession of Cartwright hanged himself in his own woods on Saturday, 26th ult.

IF any of our subscribers in the village do not get the Standard regularly they will please report to us at once, so that we can have the cause removed. We have a new carrier boy, and he may have missed some.

A MODERN SAMSON.—Wm. Brown, of Bentinck, shouldered and carried a barrel of salt one quarter of a mile, then putting the barrel on the ground took it by the chimes and threw it fourteen and a quarter feet. This feat took place yesterday in Bentinck, and was witnessed by J. W. Boulden, harness maker, and several others, of this Town.—Review.

TENDERS FOR PRINTING.—The Township of Normanby at its last meeting instructed the Clerk to invite tenders for the Township Printing in no less than three Counties. It is a wonder they did not include the City of Toronto in the list. As there is a printing office in the Township, the proprietor of which pays his share of the Township expense, we think that the Council should get the printing done there without sending outside the County. If there was a job of road making to let, the Council would not send to another County for tenders and we see no reason why a resident should not get the trifling profit of the Township printing in preference to strangers. We most respectfully decline to tender for the printing of the Township of Normanby.—Post.

THOSE of our subscribers who agreed to pay us in wood for their subscriptions will please bring it [illegible] when we will require [illegible].

SUDDEN DEATH.—A young man named Goodwin, about 25 years of age, eldest son of Mr. John Goodwin farmer, living near Thornton, was found dead yesterday afternoon in a barn belonging to his father. It is supposed that he died of heart disease. Dr. J. W. Norris, coroner was notified, but did not consider it necessary to hold an inquest under the above circumstance. The deceased was highly respected.

The Thunder Bay North Star Miner urges the establishment of rolling mills and blast furnaces at that place. It expresses the opinion that "Thunder Bay is the one point most favourable for the erection of rolling mills and blast furnaces, and capitalists can find no better site, and no better time than the present for the establishment of industries of this nature. There is here the necessary deposite of ore in quality and quantity, the opportunity of disposing of their manufacture at a large profit, and the matter of labour is also favourable, for it is generally abundant at fair wages."

SUPPOSED FIND.—Some days ago Mr. J. Ferguson, of this town, was digging a well, he found about two feet below the surface a hard substance which he supposed was rock. He broke off several pieces and one of them he took to Mr. S. H. McKitrick, who melted it down in his furnace and gave it as his opinion there was a considerable quantity of iron ore in it, but could not say then whether it was really iron ore or not. It is said this stone is very extensive hereabouts and steps will be taken by the parties owning the land on which it is found to find out exactly what it is composed of.—Orangeville Advertiser.

OUR prohesey as to the likelyhood of having to chronicle an accident occuring from children running after farmers' sleighs, has proved only too true. On Friday last Willie Noble, a little boy, aged between six and seven years, son of Mr. Alfred Noble, in company with two other lads were riding on a sleigh, when little Noble fell off, the other two jumped off, one falling across the prostrate lad, the other jumping on his legs, and breaking one of them half way between the knee and the body. The little sufferer was picked up and carried home. Dr. Carter set the broken limb and he is now doing, to use the common phrase, "as well as can be expected."

THE ILLUSTRATED SCIENTIFIC NEWS.—One of the handsomest of publications is the Illustrated Scientific News, published by Munn & Co., New York. Every number contains thirty-two pages, full of engravings of novelties in science and the useful arts. Ornamental wood work, pottery, vases and objects of modern and ancient art are finely shown. The March number contains, among various other subjects illustrated, full description of the manufacture of paper hangings, with engravings; how the deceptive curve is produced in casting the ball by the baseball pitcher, his attitude, how he holds and handles the ball, all fully illustrated. The number before us also contains engravings of Capt. Eads' proposed ship railway across the Isthmus, and a novel hydraulic railway locomotive. In addition to all this it contains many valuable recipes for artisans and housekeepers. This publication will be foud instructive and entertaining to all classes, but will be best appreciated by the most intelligent. Published by Munn & Co; 37 Park Row, New York, at $1.50 a year, and sold by all news dealers.

SPEND YOUR MONEY AT HOME.—The following excellent advice, which we find in an exchange, we judge not to be entirely inapplicable to ourselves:—It is your home; you cannot improve it much by takinig your money away to spend or invest There is no way of improving a place so much as by encouraging good merchants, good schools, and good people to settle among you, and this cannot be done unless you spend your money at home. Spend your money at home, for "that is where you get it." Spend your money at home, because when it is necessary to get credit, it is of your own town merchants you have to get it, and they must wait for the money; spend it at home. Spend your money at home. It will make better business for your merchants; they can and will keep better assortments and sell at lower rates than if the only business they could do is what is credited out, while the money goes to other places. Spend your money at home. Set the example now. Buy your dry goods, groceries and meats at home, and you will see a wonderful change in a short time in the business outlook of the place; therefore deal with your merchants at home. Your merchants are your neighbors and your friends; they stand by you in sickness—are your associates. Without your trade they cannot keep up business. No stores then, no one wanting to buy property to settle on and build up your place.

...need not publish it.

Several articles are crowded out this week but will appear in our next.

The weather for the past few days has been very pleasant and sugar making is the order of the day.

A fresh stock of prime Clover and Timothy seed, just received, at the Medical Hall.—A. Turner & Co.

Read Mr. Balmer's advertisement in another column, and if you want a good photo, or wish one enlarged, you will know where to go.

Rev J. W. Savage will preach in the Methodist church, Markdale, Sunday morning, at half past ten, and in Flesherton, at 6:30 p. m.

Reader have you a cough that does not yield to the usual remedies? Do not delay, do not despair, but try Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam the best cough cure known; a few doses of this safe and pleasant medicine will break up the most obstinate cough. All medicine dealers sell it at 25 cents per bottle.

Nothing sets a man off so much as a good-fitting suit, and H. Meggitt, of Flesherton, says he is just the man to suit you to a nicety. Give him a call.

Farmers, in the neighborhood of Flesherton, whose harness wants repairing, or have thoughts of purchaseing new ones should not fail to call on Mr. J. Gordon.

R. J. Sproule, Flesherton, for the purpose of making room for his spring importations, will, for the next thirty days, offer his immense stock at greatly reduced prices. Read Adv. in another column.

Mr. Doll, of Flesherton, has removed his branch shop in Dundalk to Mr. Deans Hardware Store. He is showing a well assorted stock of gold and silver watches, rings &c. Give him a call.

A Lecture will be given in the Presbyterian Church, Priceville on Wednesday, March 16th by Mr. Henry Meldrum. Subject—Prespyterianism, its history and worship. Admission 10 cents.

Mr. Joseph Swift, lot 275, Con. 1, S. W. Toronto and Sydenham Road Melancthon, has rented his farm, consequently he has no need of his farm stock, implements, &c, and has instructed Mr. J. W. Morrow to dispose of them on Tuesday, March 22nd. Ten months' credit on all sums over $5.

Many most remarkable cures of Deafness have been performed by Hagyard's Yellow Oil the certificates of which the proprietors will cheerfully furnish; it is the most potent remedy known for all varieties of Inflammatory action—taken internally and externally applied, it cures Croup, Rheumatism, Colds, Sore Throat, and is a perfect panacea for all manner of pain, lameness and flesh wounds.

R. J. McCoy has received instruction from Wm. Wilson, Esq. to knock down all and sundry, of his farm stock, implements, Household furniture &c., to the highest bidder on Friday March 25th, at lot 12 con. 12, Holland, $5 and under, cash, over that 10 months' credit.

An unreserved credit sale of farm stock &c, takes place on March 24th, on the premises of Mr. W. Neal, lots 163 and 164, 3rd Range S. W. Toronto and Sydenham Road, when Robert Davis will be on hand to show off the good points of the various things offered, and select your patronage therefor. Credit to Jan'y 1st 1882, on all sums over $5.

Westward, ho!—Messrs A. & A. McAulay having concluded to follow Horace Greeley's advice, and go West, or rather North-west, wish to dispose of their stock, implements, &c., and have given J. W. Morrow authority so to do, on Saturday, March 12th. Ten months' credit will be given, provided the paper is acceptable, on purchases over $5.

Mr. Brown of the "Toronto House," Markdale, embraces the present opportunity to inform the young men who frequent the skating rink that he is prepared to furnish them, on reasonable terms, with good strong serviceable pants which will fortify them against mishaps in future such as befel the gay "Lothario," referred to in last week's Standard.

"How thin is Sara Bernhardt, Pa,
The shadow of a shade?"
"Why, just about as thin, my child,
As poor-men's lemonade."

But if Sara would only take Burdock Blood Bitters she could add to her flesh and beauty very materially. These popular bitters are no fancy drink, but a pure and powerful tonic that acts upon the Stomach, Liver, Skin, and Kidneys, purifying the blood and regulating the secretions, while it renews exhausted vitality. See testimonial in another column.

The social held at Mr. Edward Rutledge's last Wednesday was a decided success. Rev. J. W. Savage gave a short account of his trip to Europe. The younger portion of the crowd amused themselves with singing and games. All seemed happy. The company dispersed about eleven o'clock, leaving the Ladies Aid Society richer about $13. The next social of the series will be held in Dufferin Hall, a week from next Tuesday.

We clip the following from the Corvallis "Gazette" Oregon, as the groom was a former, resident of Markdale, and his many friends will be pleased to know that Charlie has been, and gone, and done it. "We had the pleasure of being present at the marriage of A. C. Ewart and Miss Nettie Chase at the residence of Mr. George Tucker in this city on last Wedensday evening. The ceremony was preformed by H. P. Dunning and took place at 8 o'c.ok. A large number of guests were in attendance and a number of costly presents, indicating the high esteem in which the contracting parties were held by their numerous friends. This wedding was one of the social events of the season and highly enjoyed by all who where present; the bride was handsome, and Charlie—well, he was just as happy as mortal man could be under the circumstances. We join with many others in wishing the happy couple a long life of perfect happiness.

Surprise—On Saturdy evening, the Teacher and superintendent of Salem Sabbith School, with there wives, surprised their colleague, Mr. Joseph Pedlar, by taking possession of his domicile. Soon the ladies had the tables groaning under an abundance of tea and tea cakes of a superior quality. After tea had been disposed of, and all comfortably seated, the superintendent of the School Presented Mrs. Pedlar with a handsome pocket Bible, with the following inscription:—"Presented to Mrs Joseph Pedlar by a few friends, as a mark of their appreciation of valuable services rendered by her to Salem Sabbath School." With pleasant chat, songs and Instrumental music, a very happy evening was spent. Mr. and Mrs. Pedlar and family did their utmost to make their guests happy, and this evening will long be remembered as one little spot in which memory loves to dwell.

...woman in Manitoba gave birth to five children, all boys, the other day. Who will say anything about the sunny south now? We were thinking of emigrating to Manitoba, but if that is how they do things there, we beg to be excused.

Personal.—Mrs. A. Mc...'s who has been on a visit to her relatives in Manitoba for some time, returned home last saturday looking none the worse for her sojourn in the land of the blizzard and low temperature, and now Mac's good humored face is rippling all over with smiles, we heartily welcome Mrs. M. home. Mr. and Mrs. Savage, (the latter an old resident of Markdale and sister of W. J. McFarland Esq.) are here at present on a visit to their friends.

The stock is all new, well bought, and well worth the attention of the closest buyers. In GROCERIES you will find evrything of First-Class Value.

As I do not pursue the course of some of our windy Merchants of our neighboring Villages, of sending out numerous samples of cheap trash (with unscrupulous recommendations) outside our natural business relations, in order to impress the public that they are not properly treated by their more honorable dealers, and draw custom from the many.

You will find everything that I sell just as I represent it, and as good value as you can possibly get for your money anywhere, as I have always held that honest dealing is the only true course for a business man.

My Groceries are all bought for strictly nett cash, consequently I can and will sell at

I have also in stock and for sale, a large quantity of

PURE SEED GRAIN!

Such as White Russian, Glasgow, Red Chaff, and other varieties of Spring wheat. Also Pure Clean Peas, Oats and Barley. Prime Timothy and Clover Seed; also Flax Seeds, and as it pays each and every Farmer to sow clean seed, you will make money by paying a few cents extra, and purchasing a good article.

I am now selling large quanties of

COARSE LAND SALT,

FOR MANURE,

Which will pay every Farmer Five Dollers for every one idvested in it, and as I am anxious that every Farmer in this locality and neighboring Townships shall try it, have decided in selling in five and ten barrel lots at the Lowest Cash Price laid down by the car direct from the Manufacturers, and bought for nett cash at Bottom Prices.

I would also intimate that my

Chapultepec.

I too, I will go back.
I will turn back the wheels of Time,
And enter once again the Garden of Delight
That was called Youth.
That was called Youth—am I grown old?—it is not true—
I have heard lies before.
Alas, alas! That was called Youth.

On yesterday—I swear it was but yesterday—
I kissed her on the mouth.
They say she has been buried three-and-thirty years,
And they are all liars—I still am young,
I am still young—how else?

Ten days ago—ten days, no more—
I forded with bare feet the shallow brook,
And watched the little school of shining minnows stem the stream.
My brother was there with me, and we laughed;
Yes, and we fought, because I would go first. And then
We held each other's hand and, naked, ran
And splashed the water high and laughed again.
I wonder why he comes no more! It is so long—so long!
Every day I look for him.

And this—it, too—is all a lie—this, too—my hair,
It is not gray, but dark as night,
As dark as Egypt's night when her first-born died.
For here, see here! this is a lock of it—
She kept it twenty years.
And here—it was his doing, Satan's—
I lost it—yes, poor clown, I lost it.
The day we stormed Chapultepec,
I was forty years old that day.

That was that day, but that night—
That night a letter came; it was edged with black.
I read it there by the camp fire's light
Among the cypresses.
(You know the cypresses around Chapultepec.)
I read it—I do not know what it said—it was edged with black.
In ever saw her any more.
The cypresses around Chapultepec!
And the long moss waving in the night wind!
Come, I will whisper it to you; it is not moss, that, it is crape
Hanging from the cypresses.
I heard a wolf howl away off,
They said it was a wolf, but I knew, I knew
It was Satan laughing.

All through the long night Satan laughed at me
While I sought him,
Ever keeping just beyond my maddened reach.
I saw his gray form creep along the dark ravines
And glide through air,
While I, bruised by falls, and torn,
Stumbled o'er the nopals and the cactuses.
They say they traced me on the morrow to where I lay.
At the foot of a high rock,
By shreds of cloth that hung blood stained
Upon the bristling points of cardo leaves.
And on the hooked and barbed thorns of that wild desert.

Pshaw! this is a dream, a lying dream—
And I am young, and she is here.
I will wake up—
To-morrow I will wake.

Fashion Notes

The habit costume is in high favour.

New tinsel lace is shown in steel for new bonnets.

Shades of honeysuckle will be used on new bonnets.

Mulberries are in great demand for mourning bonnets.

Mahogany and geranium pinks are new colours in millinery.

Vandyke red is the latest colour, a shade darker than cardinal.

Duchesse de Berry hats of black velvet and jet are very stylish.

Indian beads cut in red jasper ornament new lace pins and earrings.

New open work Tuscan braids have border woven with gold tinsel.

Crushed roses of pink and crimson will be worn upon spring hats.

Clear medium French blues are revived as the latest rival of navy blues.

Some of the new patterns in cambric imitate embroidery in Roman pearls.

Bishop's purple ereque is employed to relieve delicate tints in spring bonnets.

The torquoise is largely used set in rows side by side with diamonds or pearls.

Only delicate trimming should be used on the open-work Tuscan straw bonnets.

Immense bows of very broad satin ribbon have taken the place of belt bouquets.

Japanese velvet matched in colours to the dress is much employed for dress trimmings.

Artificial roses in the fine chiffon now in use are readily mistaken for natural flowers.

A silver cub bear lying on its back with playful paws is a new ornament for the mantel.

Embroidered collars for children are larger than ever, and come in showy open-work designs.

Turned down Byron collars are imported extensively in open-work and Irish point embroidery.

The latest novelty is Irish point embroidery, which simulates the open patterns o Irish point lace.

Swiss muslin with gold dots is used for morning caps. They are fastened with quaint pins of gold.

The most fashionable rings are of hammered gold, made in pliable strips, and wound around the finger.

After dinner coffee sets in cream china, with bands of blue and gold, and decorated with gay little humming birds.

Mrs. Langtry's Limbs.

It appears, says the Brooklyn Eagle, that the second-rate beauties have conspired to present an aggregate of loveliness against which the features of Mrs. Langtry, unassisted, cannot cope. She has been successful in dealing with some of them in detail, like Mrs. Wheeler, whose arms are too slender for beauty, but whose lower extremities are plump to the verge of distraction. This, Mrs. Wheeler accidentally discovered, and invented a new fashion which concealed the upper members and freely exposed the lower, thus dealing Mrs. Langtry a cruel blow, for that exquisite creature is represented as possessing an arm for a sculptor, developed at the expense of the less public [illegible]

Brides at the Breakfast Table.

There is no more trying time to bride and groom than to appear at breakfast. One morning this week there were nineteen newly wedded husband's and spouses distributed among the prominent hotels. Just imagine the amount of sweetness concentrated in those thirty-and-odd souls, and all in one town! The hotel clerks can tell the newly-mated pairs at a glance, and a peculiar mark is affixed beside their names on the register which indicates that a bonquet of white roses will ere long find its way to the bridal chamber. Then there is another method for ascertaining if it is not a fresh couple. The husband writes "Mr. Smith" with a bold hand, and then hesitates. The clerk could dash it off in a second, but the young man leans down and adds "and wife." Then he gazes admiringly to see how "Smith and wife" looks on a book for public scrutiny. He is an inch taller, and feels that he has become a man of family, and is entitled to some recognition. But the trying ordeal comes with the entry into the hotel dining-room. The bride blushes, and imagines that every one in the room has his eyes upon her. Such cooing and billing as goes on at the table! "Let's be like old married folks," she whispers; but that will not do, and the more she tries to disguise herself the more does she convince folks that she is really just what she is. Under one roof alone there were nine of these couples last week, and the brides at breakfast looked at each other like sisters for consolation. It has been many a day since such a swoop was made upon the national capital. There is always a couple on hand, but when nearly a score meet it shows that business has picked up, and that the ministerial pocket-book is swelling. Some people attribute this marked increase in doubling-up to the severity of the weather.

Alexandra and her Daughters.

The Marquis Du Lau, says The Fiagaro, owns a statuette of white marble by a celebrated sculptor. It represents a lady of the court of Henry II. Her frail and pliant figure is molded in a long brocade petticoat, slightly turned up on one side. Her bust is encased in a stiff waist, loaded with precious stones. The head is delicate and noble, with a profile of the renaissance, and her features are chiseled as finely as cameo. A cap adorned with streaming feathers hide a portion of her hair. Such is this statuette—a jewel become a woman—a little fairy—half object of art, half apparition. It is the portrait of her royal highness the princess of Wales by M. D Epinay. An exquisite and truly royal image, representing better than any other an almost supernatural beauty.

Once descended from her pedestal the princess becomes a gentle, kind young woman, a careful mother, and an unpretending, almost citizen-like housewife. It is noticeable that when people seek to praise a princess they call her citizen-like, while in praise of an ordinary citizen's wife they will say that she is a princess in manner. A blending of these two qualities, so vastly different from one another, is necessary to the real gentlewoman. She must be a princess in heart, in soul, in generous sentiments, in courage and in appearance, and a bourgeoise in hospitality, in the love of the fireside, in the care of her children, and in principles of wise economy.

Every morning at 9 o'clock the three daughters of the princess of Wales take their music lesson. They have "mamma" waked up, who, a few minutes later, appears in her dressing-gown and remains with them till the lesson is over. Nothing interests the princess more than the education of her daughters. In music she can fully appreciate their progress, being herself a consummate musician. Her delicate, dreamy, thoroughly Danish nature betrays itself in her touch. She dotes, above all, on the melodies of Chopin and Schumann, and she plays them with wonderful talent.

The three young princesses, Louise, Victoria and Maud, differ as greatly in character as in physiognomy. The eldest, Louise, has the fine features and the grace of her mother; she is gentle, gay, and affable, in short, the Parisienne of the three. Victoria, the second daughter, is the image of her father. She is proud, rather reserved, and attaches herself little to people. When she does grow fond of some one, however, her affection never wavers. She unites to a thorough consciousness of her own dignity a generous heart, easily moved. Her intellect, which is greatly developed, only renders her the more engaging. The youngest sister, Princess Maud, can still be called a baby. She is but 10 years of age. In appearance she bears a great likeness to her grandmother, the Queen. She is good-hearted, and at times even a little serious.

The private apartments of the princess of Wales, both at Sandringham and at Marlborough house, are fitted up completely in the French style. One would believe oneself transported to a mansion in the Champs Elysees. Scattered about everywhere on plush-covered tables are an infinity of knick-knacks, such as small porcelain dogs, bird-cages with stuffed birds, figures in Dresden china, tiny flowerstands of France or Sevres, inkstands, blotters, knives, and what not, just as in the shops of Rue de la Paix. The princess' writing paper comes from Paris, as well as her dressing tables and all the latest fashionable baubles. Her different pieces of furniture are surrounded by low screens, which, in many cases, she herself has embroidered. Many objects in ivory, enamel, silver, and mother of pearl recall Prince "Bertie's" voyage to India.

Frendship, grace, and kindness—such is the motto of that royal home, where Paris is proud to occupy so large a space.

Turkish Policy in Armenia.

(From the London News.)

Although there is no truth in the report that an insurrection has broken out in Armenia, yet the conduct of the Turkish Government in that Province is well calculated to provoke a rising of the people. They are introducing large numbers of Circassions into the gendarmerie ostensibly charge with the duty of maintaining order in the country. There have been considerable differences of opinion as to the numerical proportion which the Armenian Christians bear to the Kurds and other Mussulman inhabitants of Armenia. The Turks appear determined to settle this question in a very high-handed manner. They have introduced into the country large numbers of Moslem emigrants from the Caucasus, so that substantial increase may take place in the number of the faithful. The Armenian Patriarchate at Constantinople appointed agents to make an informal but approximate census of population; but the Turkish authorities have arrested these persons, and seized their papers. By such unsatisfactory methods is the Porte endeavouring to show that Armenia should be blotted out of the map and henceforth be known as Kurdistan. Even in Constantinople all the pictures representing the old Kings and heroes of Armenia have been seized, and many of their vendors put in prison. If no outbreak takes place in Armenia it will certainly not be for want of provocation.

uscript, "a wild, hairy man was exhibited at Charing Cross that danced on a tight rope with a balance to music. He also drank a glass of ale, took off his hat, and smoked his pipe like any other Christian." Previous to that animal's appearance, the following letter appeared in the Standard of April 3, 1711, probably intended as an advertisement:

HONORED SIR: Having heard that this nation is a great encourager of ingenuity, I have brought with me a rope dancer that was caught in one of the woods belonging to the great Mogul. He is by birth a monkey, but swings upon a rope, takes a pipe of tobacco, and drinks a glass of ale like any reasonable creature. He gives great satisfaction to the quality, and if you will make a subscription for him I will send for a brother of his out of Holland, that is a very good tumbler, and also for another of the same family, whom I design for my "Merry Andrew," as being a great mimic and the greatest droll in the country where he is now.

Later, trained monkeys were used in London in a play called "The Expedition of Alexander the Great," and as the warrior passed through the various roads of Asia the animals appeared, dancing and throwing themselves from tree to tree in a most natural manner, while to the infinite amusement of the spectators and the mortal terror of the "noble army," showers of manufactured coccanuts fell upon the stage.

Drawings which are more than four hundred years old represent horses standing on their forelegs and beating time with their hind ones on a drum held by the showman, and in 1612, at a grand court festival, Moses Pluvruel, riding master to Louis XIII. of France, accompanied by nine gentlemen, went through a ballet dance on horseback, executing leaps into the air and graceful returns that were wonderful in the extreme. The following is from a show bill in the time of Queen Anne: "To be seen at the Ship upon great Tower Hill, the finest taught horse in the world. He fetches and carries like a spaniel dog. If you hide a glove, a handkerchief, a door key, a pewter basin, or so small a thing as a silver twopence, he will seek about the room until he has found it, and will then bring it to his master. He will also tell the number of spots on a card and leap through a hoop, with a variety of other performances."

According to Strutt, these exhibitions led to the formation of a regular circus, and at that time the experiment was probably first tried in the form of a regular company. On this point he says: "I believe a modern species of exhibition was introduced to public notice about forty years back, by a man named Price, who displayed his abilities at Doborey's, near Islington. Soon after, a competitor by the name of Sampson made his appearance, and he again was succeeded by Astley. The latter established a riding school near Westminster bridge, and has been a successful candidate for popular favor. These performances originally took place in the open air, and the spectators were exposed to the weather, which frequently proved unfavorable, interrupting the show, and sometimes preventing it altogether. To remedy this, Astley erected a kind of amphitheatre, completely covered, with a ride in the middle for the display of horsemanship, and a stage in front, with scenes and other theatrical decorations. To his former divertisements he then added tumbling, dancing, farcical operas, and pantomines. The success he met with occasioned a rival professor of horsemanship named Hughes, to build another theatre for similar performances not far distant, to which he gave the pompous title of the Royal Circus. Hughes was unfortunate, and died some years back, but the circus has passed into other hands, and the spectacles exhibited there in the present day (1800) are far more splendid than those of any other of the minor theatres."

In Calabria, and especially in the city of Lybaris, the people were noted for the skill they showed in training horses. This might truly be placed among the lost art or tricks, for, though we have our trained studs now, we can in no wise educate them up to the standard of the ancients. The Lybrian horses were so generally and thoroughly drilled and trained that the Crotonians, when marching against them in time of war, provided themselves with pipes and musical instruments, and so defeated the riders with incredible slaughter, as the horses, on hearing the notes, reared up and attempted to go through the figures and dances they had been taught, thus causing great confusion, and ultimately the defeat of their owners.

In olden times the hare, which is now thought to be so untractable and timid, was rendered so bold by constant training that in all the fetes and shows it held quite a prominent position; and in a very old manuscript found in the Harleian Library there is an engraving which represents a hare marching up and down, and beating a tabor to an admiring crowd of spectators. Johnson notes a similar case in the above-mentioned shows. A hare was trained to attack a dog, and as the latter rushed at his antagonist it would spring in the air, and, landing on the back of the dog, would drive its sharp claws into the flesh just before the ear, and cling with a tenacity worthy of a better cause.

Dogs rarely figure in the old engravings, and evidently the wonderful sagacity of those of these later times is not hereditary, or perhaps they have just arrived at that state of culture which results from years of careful selection. One animal only is found among the old paintings, and he is merely represented as sitting on his haunches in a most melancholy position, while a man stands in front, endeavoring, with the assistance of a huge club, to make him remain in this decidedly uncomfortable position. Even in comparatively modern times they are seldom spoken of. In 1664 "Doggies that dance the morrice" were mentioned as acting in Ben Jonson's play of "Bartholomew Fayre," and soon after a company of dancing dogs appeared at Southwark Fair, called the "Ball of Little Dogs." The showbill said: "You shall see one of them, named Marquis of Gaillerdain, whose dexterity is not to be compared; he dances with Mme. Poncette, his mistress, and the rest of their company, at the sound of instruments, all of them observing so well that they amaze everybody." At the close it declares that they have danced before the Queen and all the nobility. The most remarkable feat, however, was that of a larger dog that balanced a pole on his back that supported a large barrel that formed a roost for a cock.

The following is told of an exhibition given near Pall Mall, London, in 1700: "A number of little birds, to the amount, I think, of twelve or fourteen, being taken from different cages, were placed upon a table in the presence of the spectators, and there they formed themselves into ranks, like a company of soldiers; small caps of paper, having some resemblance to grenadiers' caps, were put on their heads, and diminutive imitations of muskets, made from wood, secured under their left wings. Thus equipped they marched to and fro several times, when a single bird was brought forward, supposed to be a deserter, and set between six of the musketeers, three in a row, who conducted him from the top to the bottom of the table, on the middle of which a small brass cannon charged with a little gunpowder had previously been placed. The deserter was placed in front of the cannon and his guards divided, three retiring on the right side and three on the other, while he was left standing by himself. Another bird then immediately came forward, and a lighted match being put into one of its claws, he hopped boldly on the tail of the cannon, and, applying the match to the priming, discharged the piece without the least appearance of fear or agitation. The moment the explosion took place, the deserter fell down and lay motionless, like a dead bird. But at the command of his tutor he rose again, and, the cages being brought, the feathered soldiers were stripped of their ornaments, and returned to them in perfect order."

The "Sulphur King."

(London Globe.)

The story of Ignazio Genuardi, whilom baron, senator, and "sulphur king" of Sicily, adds another to the many proofs which are constantly forcing themselves into notice of "the mutability of human affairs." This person, who has recently been placed as a hopeless lunatic in a private asylum at Palermo, is the son of a Sicilian letter-carrier who, having raised by means of speculations in the very smallest way a modest sum of money, bought with it a plot of land near the village of Committini. The land so bought turned out to contain a valuable sulphur deposit, the working of which brought the postman's family immense wealth. Ignazio amassed a fortune, which is said to have amounted to three millions sterling, was created a baron and senator, and obtained sufficient influence to secure for his son, who was in the priesthood, a bishop's mitre. With his immense wealth he contrived to make himself so highly popular that he never returned from the exercise of his senatorial functions in Rome without being feted as if he were a prince.

But a change came. The son of the postman thirsted to be a leader of society, and spent enormous sums in the endeavour to gratify this desire. He was aided by certain friends in dissipating his wealth, and to such an extent that he not only spent every cent, but became deeply involved and was made bankrupt. He was also arrested for fraud, was tried, and was sentenced to imprisonment. The effect of this reverse of fortune was to turn him into a hopeless lunatic; and to convert his former admirers into abusive enemies. Formerly Genuardi was to the people of Gigenti "the honest and rich capitalist," and "the benefactor." Now he is "the swindler Genuardi, who never had a sovereign of his own to fly with. "Formerly he was "the shrewd, the accomplished, the scholarly;" now he is "the dull blockhead who got himself made a senator when he was hardly fit for the post of usher," and is, to boot, one of the most wretched inmates of a lunatic asylum.

Patrolling the Ocean.

(New York Times.)

Has not the time come for the governments of England and the United States to take some action to diminish the risks of ocean navigation? Every municipal government patrols its streets, and there is no good reason why the great ocean highway should not be patrolled. Were England and the United States each to provide two steamers the route between New York and Liverpool could be thoroughly patrolled. These government steamers could remove sunken wrecks, warn passenger steamers of the locality of icebergs, and afford relief to shipwrecked vessels. A steamer with her machinery broken down would be towed free of charge by the patrol steamer, and would not, as is now too often the case, decline assistance in order to save $30,000 or $40,000 of salvage. A shipwrecked crew compelled to take to their boats would have a reasonable degree of confidence that in two or three days' time a patrol steamer would pick them up, and the owners of a missing steamer would have good reason to believe that, were she in danger or distress, help would be not far off.

The cost of patrolling the ocean highway would be inconsiderable in comparison with the benefits that would be secured thereby. Part of it might be paid by a light tax on vessels in the Atlantic trade, and the payment of such a tax would probably be more than balanced by the decrease in insurance premiums which would follow. We are compelled yearly to send naval steamers on aimless cruises in order that the young students of the Naval academy may learn practical seamanship. Were we to convert our practice ships into patrol ships, the navy department would incur little additional expense, and the safety of the ocean passage would be greatly increased.

Married Maniacs.

(Glasgow Herald.)

Sheriff Barclay, at Perth, has just held an inquest under the prisons act on a man who had died in the lunatic ward of the general prison for Scotland. The evidence disclosed some eventful and very romantic phases of this man's life. He had been arraigned at a circuit court at Jedburgh for the crime of murder, but, on proof that he had been and still was insane, he was ordered to be detained in prison during the pleasure of her majesty. He was in 1865 transmitted to the lunatic wards of the general prison. In 1875 he was so far restored that, on medical certificates, he was released on probation under an order of the secretary of state. He then took up his abode at Coldstream, of which place he was a native. Soon after his first commitment to the prison a woman in another county was also brought before a justiciary court charged also with murder. She in like manner was found to be insane, and accordingly was commited to the general prison. The two had seen each other within its wall. She too, had so far recovered, as soon after his release she was also set at liberty on a probationary order. She wended her way to Coldstream, and there the two lunatic murderers were wedded together. The man soon relapsed into a state of lunacy, and attempted to commit suicide, and therefore was recommended to his old quarters at Perth. At no lengthened interval the woman, now his wife, also replased into lunancy and was sent back to the prison where her husband had preceded her. He died from cancer in the stomach on the 9th of January last, and was buried in the graveyard of the prison. The wife is still an inmate of the lunatic ward of the general prison.

An Irish Family in Bed.

Malachi Higgins is the tenant in possession of five acres of the divided farm. The house in which he lives was built by his father when on his marriage that portion of land was allotted to him. It is a cabin consisting of a single room. The walls are made of tempered mud mixed with straw, and the water that oozes from the rotten thatch makes slimy patterns upon their white-washed faces. In this one room is a bedstead, raised about eighteen inches from the mud floor, on which a feathered bed is placed over a thick layer of straw, and in this bed sleeps every member of the family: Malachi Higgins, his wife, and the girl's heads one way; the boys' heads at the other end of the bed. Before his father succeeded in procuring a bed the family adhered to the primitive custom of sleeping "stradogue." At night, rushes and ferns being spread upon the floor, the husband and wife lay down in the middle, the youngest girl next the mother, the youngest boy next the father, and so on in graduation of age until at the extreme ends were the strangers sleeping on the outside of their respective sexes. The bedstead being raised so high off the ground affords a comfortable place where the pigs can sleep, and in winter the additional warmth supplied by the animals is welcome. The other end of the apartment is large enough to accommodate the cow and the ass, so Malachi Higgins sees no necessity for erecting a shed for these useful beasts.

A Frenchman is about to be beheaded. Under the guillotine a priest approaches him and says: "My friend, have you any last wish to make? The wish of a dying man is sacred." "Yes," replied the doomed man, "I want to learn English."

In forty years the imports of British India have risen from the value of eight millions sterling to that of fifty-three millions. The exports have advanced from twelve to sixty-seven millions sterling. The imports from the United Kingdom are valued at thirty millions sterling per annum. The exports amount to twenty-eight millions.

OUR YOUNG FOLKS.

Cousin Charley's Story.

BY MARY HALLOCK FOOTE.

Half-past five, or even a quarter to six o'clock, seems very early on a dark, winter morning; and so Robbie's mother found it when he woke at that hour and sat up in bed, calling: "Make it light!" Robbie went to bed at six o'clock, and no wonder he felt so bright and rested before dawn; but mamma, who went to bed at ten, was quite willing to wait until the sun rose to make it light.

"Why don't you keep him up an hour later, Helen?" Aunt Jeanie said. "Perhaps he would sleep later in the morning."

"But Grandmamma said:

"Let him go to sleep as long as he will; he will sit up late enough and lie abed late enough by and by. I always let my children sleep when they wanted to, and slept myself when I could."

Aunt Jeanie's little boy went to bed at eight o'clock, but he was five years older than Robbie. Walter was eight years old, and Robbie looked up to him in all things quite as if he were a man. One evening Cousin Charley was telling Walter a long story. It was a story Walter heard many times, but he was not at all tired of it. He never thought to ask Cousin Charley if he were tired of telling it. They sat together on the sofa in the dimmest corner of the room; Cousin Charley told the story in a low voice, for Grandmamma was reading, and Aunt Helen and Walter's mamma were talking over the pictures of boys' suits in a book of patterns.

"Don't you think this pretty, Jeanie,—this was one with a sailor collar and plaits in the back?" Aunt Helen was saying. "But don't you think Robbie looks well in those large collars—his shoulders are so high?"

While the two mammas bent their heads over the book, Cousin Charley's voice could be heard, although he spoke so low: "The rain came down, trickling down the trunk of the hollow tree, and wet his bed. So Mister Wolf thought he would look around for better quarters."

"Charley, don't make yourself too fascinating," said Aunt Jeanie; "It is nearly eight o'clock."

"Oh, Mamma! he's just in the best part!" said Walter.

"I'll give you ten minutes. Can you finish it in that time?"

The story was finished in ten minutes more, but Charley talked fast toward the end of the time.

The next morning, at five o'clock, all was quiet in Aunt Helen's room, the lamp was unlit, the fire unkindled, and a pale glimmer of moonlight shone through the curtain, for the moon had risen late and was making the most of her time. Tick! tick! sounded from the hall below, where the old clock talked to itself all night long and never slept.

Quarter past five, half past, and Robbie still asleep. Tick! tick! tick!—ten minutes' more rest for Mamma. Now there is a stirring and heaving of the counterpane; an arm, short and fat, clothed in white flannel, is thrown out. Robbie turns over on his back and breathes more quickly. Robbie is waking. Presently, uprises the tumbled white head: "Mamma! Mamma! Make it light!"

Mamma rouses herself, thinking she cannot have been asleep more than an hour.

"Robbie, do go to sleep again. It isn't morning yet. Can't Robbie sleep a little longer?"

Robbie throws of the coverlet and and sits up in the bed.

"Robbie don't want to sleep. Robbie did sleep! Make it light!"

"Come, lie in Mamma's arms a little while. See how dark it is! that is the moon shining."

Mamma takes Robbie close in her arms, feels his hands to know if they are warm, and slipping one hand under his night-gown, softly rubs his back, and smooth fat legs, hoping to soothe him into quite. "Listen to the clock ticking—tick! tick! tick! Everybody in the house is asleep! Grandmamma is asleep, and Aunt Jeanie's asleep, and Walter's asleep, and Katy's asleep, and pussy's asleep, down in the dining room, by the fire. Now, Robbie shut his eyes and asleep, too.

May be a little dream will come!"

Mamma is almost asleep herself by this time, and stops rubbing. "Want to see pussy!" Robbie says, lifting his head. "Mamma, get pussy!"

"Mamma could n't get pussy now. Poor pussy! She wants to sleep. Robbie shall see pussy after breakfast."

"Where is breakfast? Robbie want breakfast!"

"There is no breakfast yet. Katy is fast asleep,—the kitchen is all dark, and the dinning-room is all dark, and the dishes are shut up in the closet, and the bread and butter are in the pantry, and—Robbie shut his eyes and try to sleep. When he wakes up again, may be it will be light."

"Robbie is 'wake! Make it light now!" Robbie places both hands on Mamma's chest and raises himself in bed; he crawls up a little higher and buries one hand in the pillow; a braid of Mamma's hair is under the hand.

"Oh, Rob! Don't pull Mamma's hair! Do lie down!"

"Make it light!" Robbie says, and mamma hears him drumming on the head-board with his fat feet. Mamma looks at the watch and finds that he has only wakened at his usual hour, so she puts on her slippers and wrapper, lights the lamps, places the screen before it, and touches a match to the kindlings, already laid in the fire-place. Robbie is so interested watching all these preparations for his comfort that he lies quite still. The fire roars and crackles, and a bright, dancing light chases the shadows across the ceiling. Mamma is just lying down again, when Robbie calls:

"Ammals! ammals! Want my ammals!" Mamma puts on her slippers again, and gets the Noah's ark, with the animals rattling around inside, most of them without legs, and several of the species entirely extinct.

"And the boat!" Robbie commands, from his high seat on the pillows. The boat is really the snuffer-tray, an old fashioned silver-plated one, which had stood on the high Mantel, holding the snuffers, ever since Mamma could remember. The snuffers had not been used for almost as long a time, and were very stiff in the hinges; but the tray was still in active service, playing various parts in the children's dramas. At present it was used as a boat, in which the animals from the ark were ferried over the rolling sea of bed-covers. Robbie had no faith in the sea-worthy qualities of the ark. It stood on the [illegible], and the [illegible] with one leg,

(From [illegible].)

The bell of St. Croce, in the hill campanile over the cloisters which form part of the Villa d' Este, rang out at 12:00. It was a bad bell, like most Italian bells, and I naturally alluded to the superiority of Belgian bells, above all others, rather to my surprise, Liszt said: "Yes, but how are they played? I remember being much struck by the Antwerp carillon." I described to him the mechanism of the carillon clavecin and [illegible], and reminded him that the Antwerp carillon was much out of tune, Bruges being superior as well as of heavier calibre, and Mechlin bearing off the palm for general excellence. We stopped short on one of the terraces, and he seemed much interested with a description I gave him of a performance by the great carilloneur, M. Denyn, at Mechlin, and which reminded me of Rubinstein at his best. He expressed surprise when I alluded to Van den Gheyn's compositions for bells, laid out like regular fugues and [illegible] voluntaries, and equal in their way to Bach or Handel, who were contemporaries of the great Belgian organist and carilloneur. "But," he said, "the Dutch have also good bells. I was once staying with the King in Holland, and I believe it was at Utrecht that I heard some bell music which was quite wonderful. I have listened myself to that Utrecht carillon, which is certainly superior, and is usually well handled. We had again reached the upper terrace, where the Abbate's midday repast was being laid out by his valet. It was a charming situation for lunch, commanding that wide and magnificent prospect to which I have alluded; but Autumn was far advanced, there was a fresh breeze, and the table was ordered indoors. Meantime, Liszt, laying his hand upon my arm, we pass through the library, opening to his bedroom, and thence to a little sitting-room, (the same which commanded that view of the Campagna.) Here stood his grand Erard piano. "As we are talking of bells," he said, "I should like to show an 'Angelus' which I have just written;" and opening the piano, he sat down. This was the moment which I had so often and so vainly longed for. When I left England it seemed to me as impossible that I should ever hear Liszt play, as that I should ever see Mendelssohn, who has been in his grave for 33 years. How few of the present generation have had this privelege. At Bayreuth, I had hoped, but no opportunity offered itself, and it is well known that Liszt can hardly ever be prevailed upon to open the piano in the presence of strangers. A favorite pupil, Polig, who was then with him at the Villa d' Este, told me he rarely touched the piano, and that he himself had seldom heard him; "but," he added with enthusiasm, "when the master touches the keys, it is always with the same incomparable effect, unlike anyone else; always perfect." "You know," said Liszt, turning to me, "they ring the 'Angelus' in Italy carelessly; the bells swing irregularly, and leave off, and the cadences are often broken up thus:" and he began a little swaying passage in the treble—like bells tossing high up in the evening air; it ceased, but so softly that the half-bar of silence made itself felt, and the listening ear still carried the broken rhythm through the pause. The Abbate himself seemed to fall into a dream; his fingers fell again lightly on the keys, and the bells went on, leaving off in the middle of a phrase. Then rose from the bass the song of the Angelus, or rather, it seemed like the vague emotion of one who, as he passes, hears in the ruins of some wayside cloister the ghost of old monks humming their drowsy melodies, as the sun goes down rapidly, and the purple shadows of Italy steal over the land, out of the orange west! We sat motionless—the disciple on one side, I on the other. Liszt was almost as motionless; his fingers seemed quite independent, chance ministers of his soul. The dream was broken by a pause; then came back the little swaying passage of bells, tossing high up in the evening air, the half-bar of silence, the broken rhythm—and the Angelus was rung.

Steam and Iron on the Sea.

SOME OF THE GREAT OCEAN STEAM-SHIPS—MONSTERS BUILT—LARGER ONES IN COURSE OF CONSTRUCTION—THE DAY OF SAILING SHIPS OVER.

(From the New York Sun.)

At the close of last year there were in course of construction on the Clyde about fifty steamers of upward of and about 3,000 tons each. Twenty years ago there were not half as many steamers of that size in the whole world. The few that did exist were looked upon as marine curiosities.

Among the steamers on the stocks in the Scotch yards are one of 8,500 tons, one of 7,000 tons, one of 6,250 tons, one of 5,500 tons, and two of 5,000 tons each. These are all designed for the transatlantic steamship companies, and are double and three times the size of the vessels in use not longer ago than fifteen years.

The Great Eastern, it is true, was launched in 1858, and was larger than any of these steamers, but she was rather a phenomenon than a step in the orderly progress of naval architecture. For the purposes for which she was built, those of a great freight and passenger steamer for long voyages, the Great Eastern proved unfit, and her construction brought heavy financial loss on her builders. It was only the development of ocean telegraphy that gave her a chance opportunity which saved the huge ship from complete failure as a useful vessel.

Now, however, we find the ocean steamers every year increasing in size, and immediately going into active service. The new Cunard steamer, the Servia, for instance, will be of 8,500 tons, if we take the Custom House measurement, but of about 11,000 tons of actual weight when loaded for sea. She therefore approaches the Great Eastern in size; but, unlike her, will be a vessel thoroughly adapted to the severe and steady use required of an ocean steamer on one of the great Atlantic lines, and unlike her, she represents in her construction the latest advances in practical marine architecture.

Steamers of a tonnage equal to that of the Servia will hereafter be common on the greatest of our ocean highways, that between New York and Liverpool They have been rendered possible by the introduction of the screw propeller, and by the success of the compound engines. These two improvements have revolutionized the carrying trade of the world. It is now done by the steamers rather than the sailing ships, upon which steam must more and more encroach until it controls all but a very small part of commerce. Already three-quarters of the merchant marine of Europe are steamers, and the European nations generally are rapidly increasing their commercial navies in the same direction.

The last paddle wheel steamer built for the Cunard line was the Scotia, launched in 1861. Compound engines were first introduced at about the same time. Very nearly simultaneously, too, iron began to supersede wood as a material for shipbuilding. From that time forward our shipyards steadily declined in activity, and our share of the carrying trade of the world became less and less. From that time, moreover, dated the establishment of England as the great builder of ships for the world. Steam and iron revolutionized naval architecture and made England the master of it.

Steamers of greater and greater size will be built, for the larger they are the more cheaply they can carry freight The power and consequent cost of fuel increase only about as the area of the midship section, while the carrying capacity, of course, increases in a much higher ratio. These steamers, too, must of necessity be of iron.

Can we compete with the Clyde shipbuilders in construction of such vessels? When we can, and only then, American shipbuilding will resume its old importance in comparison with that of England, and our share of the carrying trade of the world will be restored to us. That is the nub of the whole question of supremacy in the shipbuilding and carrying trade, about which we hear so much talk.

The South African Dutchmen have given their British friends more trouble than was expected. These slow-going, plodding, somewhat easy and good-natured people, you know, when they do get their dander up are no joke by any manner of means. The Boers seem to have much of the spirit of their forefathers, the famous Dutchmen of the great Republic.

Greece is still making a tremendous noise for so small a state, and threatening to do terrible things, if, if, if— but Europe seems inclined to pay no great attention to what either she or Turkey does so long as they keep within decent bounds at all, and do not set all their neighbours by the ears. It must be humiliating to be a little state in Europe with so many big fellows looking patronisingly on, and always ready to give a metaphorical shake or box on the ear whenever things don't exactly suit them.

The Land System in Ireland.

(From [illegible].)

"Landlordism," as it is now very generally called, or the system by which the land in Ireland is held and cultivated, is on all hands acknowledged to be largely responsible for the deplorable state of things that has for so long reigned almost supreme in that unhappy country. By the vast mass of the Irish people themselves, and by an increasing number of thinking men everywhere, it is considered a perfect curse, a bane, and inevitable hindrance to anything like progress or prosperity. A system which gives complete control of the sole means of earning a livelihood which it is any way possible to the great mass of the Irish peasantry, to a minority in many cases very largely removed from all sympathy with the majority both by birth,

[illegible] AND RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATIONS

and by habits, may well be questioned as to the capacities for good that it contains. However the principle of "the greatest happiness for the greatest number" may be considered an excellent one in theory, in Ireland at any rate the practical aspect of the case has had so attenuated an opportunity of displaying itself, that to all intents and purposes it has remained a theory and nothing more. Perhaps also it is destined to remain a theory, and will most assuredly remain such, will shine dimly through the uninteresting nebulosity of theoretical basiness, if the thoughtless and merely animal injustice, or the deliberate tyranny of the "happy" minority, is the only Providence, that is to say the only instrument of Providence, to which a less fortunate majority can look for an extension of that benefit, which philosophers consider as the great end of existence, and the "summum bonum" of human life. "The least misery of the least number" rather than "the greatest happiness of the greatest number" would seem to us the more reasonable way in which to grasp the "great unknown" phantom which has floated like some beautiful mirage before the eyes of many of

THE GREAT AND GOOD OF ALL AGES;

but that of course is mere matter of opinion on our part, and whichever view of the possibilities of human life be adopted, the results may, probably enough in the end, amount to very nearly the same thing. One advantage, however, of what may appear to many as the more desponding and presumptuously sceptical view, is most undeniably that the subsequent disappointment, which is sure to be felt sooner or later, will be lighter in the one case than in the other, and the inducement to try again, consequently greater. In Ireland, at any rate, at the present moment and for long centuries in the past, it might well seem that to lessen the amount of human misery even though to an indefinitely small extent, was all that man could hope to do.

It is impossible to realize the depth and sincerity of this great Irish movement which is making itself so widely felt over the whole civilized world, unless we fully understand that to the great majority of the Irish people, the cultivation of the soil is their only means of living. Deprive them of that and starvation stares them in the face at once.

THE LAND IS TO THE IRISHMAN,

in most cases what the sea is to every fisherman, it is his very life. Now, as a certain well-known writer has pointed out, take a limited area of the sea, assign to it some three millions or more of fishermen, manage things so that every other means of living is closed against them, rule off this tract of sea into a number of sub-divisions, more or less microscopical, give the absolute control of these into the hands of an alien race not fishermen at all; give that race the power to extract nine fish and a half in every ten fish caught, for the privilege of using one of the microscopical tracts of water aforesaid and getting a "living" out of it; endow this alien race with the capacities of minor and terrestrial Providences, so that they shall be able to say to this man "go" and he goeth, and to another man "come" and he cometh, and so that they shall be at perfect liberty to "evict" any fisherman who is already paying nine fish and a half, but who has a wife and six children to support, and cannot conscientiously promise to give the nine fish and threequarters which a neighbour more fortunate it may be as regards the good things of this world, or perhaps only less scrupulous, has been willing to offer to the landed or rather "watered" gintleman and proprietor, for the privilege of being given a chance to live; do all this and you will have a fairly intelligible notion of what have been able to accomplish in Ireland for some hundreds of years back, and you will cease to wonder moreover that the "fishermen" and the "alien race" do not always look at the world and things in general through lenses of the same texture and decisiveness. From a purely commercial standpoint of "individualistic" selfishness, it is no doubt an exercise of power in the highest degree legitimate, and to be harmonized in an excellent way with whatever remnants of a moral nature "science" and "advanced thought" in their wisdom may have left us, to secure from a man who through no fault of his own has been brought into this world, and who since he is here is naturally anxious to remain as long as possible; to secure we say from such an one, the nine fish and a half which he is pleased to offer as an inducement to be allowed to live, or even nine fish and three-quarters for that matter of it, or nine fish and nineteen twentieths, if he thinks he can live himself or even support a wife and family into the bargain on the one twentieth of the fish, which no power in Heaven or on earth can make more than a twentieth. That of course is his look out.

BRITISH JUSTICE AND FAIR-PLAY

EVERY MAN FOR HIMSELF,

and "Deil tak' the hin'most," is a most wise, just and excellently Christian maxim, and has been acted on in Ireland by those who should have known better, in a most praiseworthy and assiduous manner. As results go to show however, the practical carrying out of this great truth does not seem to have given universal satisfaction. "Hold perfectly still until you are bled, or at any rate until we can devise some method for your relief," would not be considered a very reasonable command to lay on any man who was troubled with the attentions of a vampire, nor would it be thought a case for very strong "coercive" measures if in spite of all warnings and advice to the contrary, the unfortunate victim were to work himself into a state of considerable nervous excitement. It might be hard on the vampire perhaps, but still, most people would be inclined to try a more or less rough application at that end of the question, even though the unfortunate animal should be deprived of a full half of its supper or "income," as in this case it would be. It is sad, of course if a labouring man has to go without his dinner more or less frequently, to live in and see his children growing up to a heritage of dirt and degradation, but God made the world, we didn't, the presence of suffering in this world is a great mystery, man's heritage is woe, he is "born to trouble as the sparks fly upward," but we can't explain it, and we are not responsible for it, it is a sad thing for the Irish peasant no doubt, but still, if it comes to be a question between the more or less complete emptiness of the Irish peasant's stomach and the more or less overflowing fulness of the Irish landlord's purse, then at all hazards the "rights" of property must be preserved, and the essential distinction between a "gentleman" and a "man" placed in the clearest of all possible lights. This is the philosophy of many. That there is an essential difference between a "gentleman" and a "man" every intelligent person will admit, and indeed his intelligence may in a manner be guaged so to speak by the tenacity with which he clings to this conviction. There being so many intelligent persons in this world, and the essential difference aforesaid having been one of the dearest of this world's maxims for a long long time, it will be easily understood that the above mentioned view of the "Irish Question" is by no means an unusual one, even though it may not meet with universal acceptance.

KING HUMBERT and Queen Margherita were welcomed enthusiastically during their recent first visit to the island of Sicily. The vivas were loud and hearty in every town their Majesties passed through, and they did not fall in with a single brigand.

The present quarter of the nineteenth century seems an epitome of all the past centuries, and a modern newspaper a birdseye view of all past history. The most savage barbarism and most enlightened civilization stand side by side, and are chronicled [illegible]. The savage [illegible] shown in the Peruvian war can hardly have been surpassed by much that happened during the middle ages, while a description of the Cooper Institute and its lecturer could only have been possible at this late age of the world.

Late the other evening a merchant was playing cards with a railroad official who was rather sleepy at the time. "I pass," said the merchant. The railroad man was awake in an instant. "No, you don't," said he, "not on this line. You pay your fare, or walk."

An Irishman was accused of stealing a handkerchief of a fellow-traveller, but the owner, on finding it, apologized to Pat, and said that it was a mistake. "Arrah, my jewel," retorted Pat, "it was a two-sided mistake—you took me for a thief and I took you for a gintleman."

"I suppose that you are very glad that your husband is entirely cured of his rheumatism?" said a doctor to a fashionable lady. "Yes, I suppose I ought to be, but from now on we will have to guess at the weather or by a barometer, if his bones quit aching before a damp spell."

"What is the meaning," asked a Galveston school-teacher, "of the term 'non compos mentis?'" None of the boys knew, whereupon the teacher explained: "It means that because you don't know it you are liable to be called 'non compos mentis.' Do you understand now what it means?"

There is a marble lamb on the tombstone of an old man, and when an old friend saw it for the first time, he exclaimed: "How appropriate!" "Was he of a gentle disposition?" "Whew! I guess not. He would shoot in a minute, but he always overfed himself on spring lamb and green peas. That's what killed him, I reckon."

The night editor of a Nova Scotia journal wrote the following head line to one of his cable dispatches: "The British Lion Shaking His Mane." He was unable to eat his breakfast the next morning when he found the printer's version of the matter staring him in the face thus: "The Briaish Lion Skating in Maine."

A little miss has a grandfather who has taught her to open and shut his crush hat. The other day, however, he came with an ordinary silk one. Suddenly he sees the child coming with the new stovepipe wrinkled like an accordeon. "Oh," grandfather," she says, "this one is very hard. I've had to sit on it, but I can't get it more than half shut."

A DEVOUT Methodist asked Wesley what he thought as to his marrying a certain woman well known to both. Wesley advised him not to think of it. "Why," said the other, "she is a member of your church, isn't she?" "Yes," was the reply. "And you think she is truly a Christian woman?" "Yes," said Wesley, "I believe she is." "Well, then, why not marry her?" "Because my friend, the Lord can live with a great many people that you and I can't."

A boarder asked a diminution of his rent because of the dampness of his room. It was naturally refused, and the boarder gave notice that he would leave. He got even with his landlord by planting a beautiful mushroom in his bed-chamber, and whenever anyone came to see the apartment he would call to the servant girl: "Bridget, see here; what is this mushroom doing in this room? It seems to me that I told you to take it way." To which Bridget replies: "I did as you told me, sir, but another must have grown there since."

"When is a man not a man?" asked Jones. Of course he expected everybody to give it up, and then he was going to say, "When he is a shaving." But they didn't give it up; not a bit of it. One said it was when he was fool enough to deal in conundrums; another answered it was when he worked over jokes a thousand years old, and a third told Jones to look in the glass and see for himself. Jones said he didn't see what in time they were driving at, but somehow he had lost all interest in his conundrum, and hadn't the heart to tell them the true answer.

Be as Thorough as You Can.

Whatsoe'er you find to do,
Do it, boys, with all your might!
Never be a little true,
Or a little in the right.
Trifles even
Lead to heaven,
Trifles make the life of man;
So in all things,
Great or small things,
Be as thorough as you can.

Let no speck that surface dim—
Spotless truth and honor bright!
I'd not give a fig for him
Who says any lie is white!
He who falters,
Twists or alters
Little atoms when we speak,
May deceive me;
But believe me,
To himself he is a sneak!

Help the weak if you are strong,
Love the old if you are young,
Own a fault if you are wrong,
If you're angry hold your tongue.
In each duty
Lies a beauty,
If your eyes you do not shut,
Just as surely
And securely
As a kernel in a nut!

Love with all your heart and soul,
Love with eye and ear and touch;
That's the moral of the whole,
You can never love too much!
'Tis the glory
Of the story
In our babyhood begun;
Our hearts without it—
Never doubt it—
Are the world's without a sun.

If you think a word will please,
Say it, if it is but true;
Words may give delight with ease,
When no act is asked from you,
Words may often
Soothe and soften,
Gild a joy or heal a pain;
They are treasures
Yielding pleasures
It is wicked to retain.

Whatsoe'er you find to do,
Do it, then, with all your might;
Let your prayers be strong and true—
Prayer, my lads, will keep you right,
Prayer in all things,
Great and small things,
Like a Christian gentleman;
And forever,
Now or never,
Be as thorough as you can.

HIS VICTORIA CROSS.

CHAPTER VII.—CONTINUED.

"Not yours—you said so—I knew it; you said so." Wistfully, appealingly, the beautiful earnest eyes were raised to his, the slender hand was laid on his; and he turned aside with quivering lips.

"You have heard that?" he muttered, shading his eyes with one hand. "Do not heed what I said—I forgot that you were here—I know scarcely what I said. So you have heard that story of my life? Forgive me, Cecil; I could not tell you."

"I heard it weeks ago," she answered, more steadily now. "I would not even ask you, because I did not believe it was all true—my father trusted you."

"Dear loyal heart!" said Colonel McLeod softly, half regretfully. The words came involuntarily from his lips. "Who wins this will win gold."

She crimsoned to her very brow, gave one fleeting glance upward and met the dark soft eyes that spoke such yearning tenderness all unconsciously, and then her head dropped upon his hand. One brief second she struggled; but her loyal heart triumphed.

"You have won it," came in a low whisper.

Then the bowed face was lifted gently and drawn to his breast, his arms enfolded her, his lips were pressed to her forehead, and his tremulous passionate words fell like music on her ear.

"Cecil, is it so, my heart's life—my darling!"

It seemed as if even for him the sunlight might shine in its dazzling brightness. She loved him. Her pure fresh heart was given to him. Come what might, life could never be quite the mere dull monotony of days to Loris McLeod.

Then a sharp revulsion came. He had no right to hold her to his breast so; yet, oh, how could he put her from him—sever this new sweet tie?

"Cecil," he murmured hoarsely, "it must not be; leave me while there is time; do not tempt me—for Heaven's sake do not tempt me!"

But the girl's slender hands only clasped his more closely as she hid her face on his breast.

"You will not send me from you?" she murmured brokenly. "You are not angry with me? I could not see you suffer."

"My heart, you are only too dear to me," said McLeod; and he stopped, striving for self-control. "How can I link your young life to mine, blighted, seared, weary? How can I give to you a name shadowed with dishonour?"

Cecil raised her head with a quick proud movement.

"It is not dishonoured to me," she said in a clear distinct voice—"to me you are all that is noble and brave. What care I that your life has been blighted? That will only make me cling closer to you."

The fair head drooped again, and a half-smile of exquisite peace stole over the beautiful lips.

"Oh," she said, closing her eyes and drawing a long quivering breath, "it is so little I can give to you who give all to me! Why to think that I, only a weak, fragile girl, should be aught to you!"

"Cecil, hush; you exalt me too much!"

Her joy and her fulness of love and trust held him with a strange awe, while to her it seemed so wondrous that this man, to her the noblest on earth, should have her crowned with the diadem of his love.

"Cecil," he said a little hurriedly, "listen. You trust me so perfectly that you never think that there may have been more than justice, according to the known facts, dealt to me. Why should you suppose that there was no dishonour in my yielding up, without a blow struck for defence, what had been given to me as a charge to hold, come what might?"

"I don't know," she answered simply, in absolute childlike faith. "I thought perhaps you found, after all, you could not hold the town. I know you would never have shrunk from encountering any numbers, nor would you have led your men to certain death without good reason."

She felt him shiver from head to foot; yet still he spoke with a forced calm.

"It might have been, Cecil—as some believed of me—that I was young and wild for glory, and could not brook to die there behind walls, without any chance of the glory I coveted."

"No," answered Cecil directly, "that is impossible; you would not care to win glory at the expense of a soldier's greatest crime but one—disobedience—you would not care to step to fame over the bodies of the men you had sacrificed."

Colonel McLeod turned aside, veiling his eyes with his hand.

"Child—child," he said with bitter sadness, "will nothing shake this blind faith of yours? What though I sinned in neither of these things? Was I right to shield a ——" He covered his face suddenly and bent down. "No, no, I cannot say it—not that, my bright-haired lad. Could he know what he was doing?"

The girl's cheeks grew pale at these words, yet she said nothing and asked no question. To recall that past was almost to endure its agony again. She could tell that by the quick heavy breath he drew, by the tense clasp of the hand that held hers, and by the low slow whisper when at last he spoke, telling of the mental and physical exhaustion that follows sharp mental pain.

"No word of this that I must tell you has passed my lips until now," he said, not then raising his head. "I had thought to let the bitter secret die with me; but you have a right to know, and I—Heaven help me!—I cannot choose but clear my honour to the woman I love."

He paused a moment, then went on more quietly.

"You know, Cecil—you told me—all the facts of that time; you know that I suddenly abandoned Gherutpoor and fell back on Kotul. It was perfectly true that the fort was well-nigh impregnable in fair siege; but when I evacuated it it was already too late to make resistance. We had been betrayed. There were subterranean passages piercing the hills on which the fortifications stood. I knew nothing of them, nor did any one else, save, as I found afterwards, one man—that was my brother, Cecil."

She started and flushed, then grew pale again, but only a half-exclamation of pain escaped her. Her heart was aching for the man who had blighted his own life and borne another's dishonour with such untold heroism.

"Very few people knew that I had a brother," the Colonel went on in the same quiet manner—"none, I think, in India. He was my mother's darling, Cecil, and my father's pride—a fair-haired bright-eyed lad. I don't think any one knew the nature that was masked by the fair winsome face. I thank Heaven my mother died before Archie —— But it matters little; she would never have known it. Well, he was always wayward and unsteady—a spoiled darling; and my mother, when she died, bad me watch over him and guard him. I promised her I would; and I did so as far as I was able. I loved the lad, as most did; and it was the bitterest grief I had known then when he ran away from home. He was at a private tutor's—my father had to remove him from Eton—and he must have got involved in some affair which he feared to reveal at home; in addition to which he had always a passion to go to India. He was sixteen then. I never saw or heard of him again till I went out to India, not long after the outbreak of the Mutiny; then he came to me, almost destitute, deeply penitent for the past. I dare not say that was feigned; I think he was true then—Heaven knows I may not judge him. I loved him—I could not turn from my mother's darling. He said he had suffered much, and had been at various native Courts; but he spoke little of that part of his life. I kept him near me as much as possible; he was serving in the ranks, Cecil, and he went with my men to Gherutpoor.

"One night he was missing—he had stayed beyond the walls, we thought, and had fallen into the enemy's hands and probably been shot. Not long after that, while we were anxiously looking for reinforcements, I had just made the rounds of the ramparts the last thing one night, and was going off to get an hour's sleep, when one of our natives came up and gave me a scrap of paper. I knew the writing directly, and the cipher used was one known only to Archie and myself—one we had invented as children. He was a prisoner, he said, among the Sepoys. He had betrayed the town under threats. There were underground passages of which he alone knew; he had revealed them; they had laid mines in them under the town, and intended to blow up the whole place late that very night. There lay about four hours between us and certain destruction, Cecil; and more, the road to Kotul would then lie absolutely defenceless. Their garrison was weak, and there was no one to warn them.

"There was no time then to feel the blow that at another time must have paralyzed every nerve. There was no defence to be made. My brother said he had managed to warn me; it was all he could do. I know not to this day whether this was all—all—treachery. Perhaps if I had known, even then, could I have betrayed my own brother, and brought foul shame on the name we bore? My father, too—it would have broken his heart!"

Colonel McLeod paused again. He was white to the lips; yet they burned like fire, and the blood coursed hotly through his veins; but he nerved himself to finish his story.

"There is little more to add, Cecil. The garrison was roused; and, under cover of the darkness, we marched out—like men," he said, with strong bitterness, "we dared not face an enemy. Was that a light thing to bear? But the Sepoys did not blow up Gherutpoor when they found it empty; the gates must have been quietly opened by—my brother. I thought I might reach and strengthen the garrison at Kotul, unless we should chance to fall in with reinforcements. The rebels, in overwhelming numbers, came up with us while miles of country lay between us and Kotul; and my men fought with the courage of lions; but it was hopeless. They fell around me by scores, whilst I, whose only prayer was for death, seemed to bear a charmed life. Then reinforcements came, but too late to save aught but the life that was a curse to me——"

"Hush, hush! Oh, Loris, no!" whispered Cecil, with passionate earnestness. Heaven is too merciful to lay that curse for ever upon you."

"Forgive me, my child!" he answered, with a deep humility that touched her to the quick. "Your simple faith is a rebuke to the bitterness that burns within me sometimes. I may have seemed patient outwardly; but I have not always been so, Heaven knows! Such patience as I have is bought with tears of blood."

He paused for a moment.

"You know," he went on, "that I was tried by court-martial? The sentence was death, Cecil; but the Commander-in-Chief in India sent the case home for final consideration, and that sentence was reversed. But the under-current of suspicion has ever been at head-quarters—that I have always known—that I betrayed Gherutpoor. The only explanation I could give was not satisfactory; and I had disobeyed orders."

He rose as he spoke the last words, raised the girl gently from her kneeling posture, and laid his hands on her shoulders.

"You know now, Cecil," he said softly and quietly, "all that rests on this name I bear. It is dishonour. I would not drag you down to that, my child. If it were but given to me to redeem that name! But this is all over now."

She threw herself upon his breast with an intensity of passion that startled and shook him to the heart, quivering with deep-drawn sobs, which could not be quieted, even by his loving touch and soothing whispers.

"It is for your sake, darling!" he said, at length when she lay tranquil like a tired child, clinging to him as though she could not bear to miss the clasp of his hand. "I strove to hide from your eyes this love I bear you. I could have borne to see you the wife of another if you could have been happy so. And now I have, all unwittingly, brought the first cloud on your young life, my Cecil!"

He put back with lingering tenderness the clustering curls from her brow, and met the blue eyes that looked up with such wistfulness.

"You do not know what it would be to live day after day under the cloud that shadows this life of mine. I have passed my youth, dear, and I have grown used to walking in shadow. Sunshine is not a necessity to me as it is to you in the springtime of life."

"Don't; I can't bear it!" she cried, with a quick gasp, as the sweet voice faltered and was silent. "There would be no sunshine for me without you. I could not live, and should break my heart to know you were lonely and weary, and I was not with you. You called me your 'sunshine' once. Oh, let me be that, let me be happy in trying to lighten your burden!"

"Cecil, Cecil, spare me! My own heart pleads so for this joy! A moment—hush with me!"

He released her, and turned away, walking from her down the long room. How could he be strong here, when those dear wistful eyes looked into his, and those clinging fingers were touching his?

She drew back, watching him, her lips half parted, the colour flitting over her soft cheek.

While Loris McLeod still strove with the deathless love that pleaded for her, he heard not the mad galloping of a horse's hoofs without on the gravel, or the loud echoing peal of the bell. But Cecil did, and knew not what strange impulse made her bound forward to the door, and then stop, pressing her hand over her throbbing heart. She had no distinct thought, she did not know what she expected; but yet, when a light tap was heard at the library-door, and Hector entered, her eye fell without surprise on the yellow envelope he carried.

"Give it to me," she said quietly. Is any one waiting?"

"No, Miss Verner. An orderly from Hyde brought the telegram on," said Hector; and he withdrew.

Then the girl sprang to the Colonel's side, and he turned to her. He had given no heed to what had passed; and she put the telegram into his hand. With a violent effort he forced himself to calmness, and tore open the envelope.

The next moment the paper dropped from his hand. With a smothered cry he sank down upon a chair near him, and bowed his head on his locked hands.

"At last, at last! Thank Heaven!"

And yet the message that Cecil read with rapture was only a summons to dire danger, perhaps to death. It ran thus—

"Join the —th at Chatham at once, embark on the 22nd. Colonel Darnley ill. Insurrections there."

CHAPTER VIII.

"It may be, Cecil, that I shall never come back to you, but, whatever befalls, I shall die, Heaven willing, as a soldier should die. And so farewell, my own darling!"

They were the last words Colonel McLeod spoke, as he folded the girl in his arms, and pressed his lips to hers with lingering tenderness. It might be the last time he should so hold her to his heart, so kiss those soft lips, so meet the brave loving gaze of those blue eyes.

He could not speak; but he smiled, and took the wistful face in his hands, looking down upon it as though he would grave every line on heart and memory.

Then he turned away, and went out into the hall, where Hector, his faithful attendant, awaited him, where there were signs of departure; and through the open doorway could be seen the noble chestnut horse the Colonel always rode, led up and down by a groom. The servants all collected to say the last "good-bye" to the master, and old Colin stood looking wistfully in the entry.

Mrs. Annandale and Alice, whose ready tears were flowing, came out from the drawing-room.

The Colonel had already taken leave of them, and had told Mrs. Annandale alone that he left Cecil as his promised wife, which information had greatly pleased his kinswoman, though it had not very greatly astonished her.

"What, tears, my little maid?" said the Colonel, with his bright gentle smile, as he put his arm round Alice, and kissed her once more. "A soldier's lassie? Be brave and hopeful, my child. I dare say I shall come back to Ridinghurst, after all."

The servants crowded about him, the women in tears; and for every one, from the stately butler down to the little kitchen-maid, who half hid behind the house-keeper's skirts, between grief at the Colonel's departure and wondering awe of his uniform, he had a firm hand-clasp and gentle word of farewell.

But, when he had sprung into his saddle and had gathered the reins in his hand, while Hector sat like a statue awaiting his master's word, Colonel McLeod glanced round, half paused, then, as if some thought had struck him, called to Cecil to come out.

"Only a fancy," he said a little hurriedly, bending down to her and holding her hand in his ungloved right hand. "Yours must be the last touch. Heaven watch over you, my heart's dearest!"

They watched him down the long avenue as far as they could see; and, long after horse and rider were lost to sight, they could hear the click of the hoofs echoed back from the quiet country roads.

Then Cecil turned back with her sister to the drawing-room and stood by the fire, looking down into the blaze, one hand resting on Colin's brown head—he was her charge now.

There was a dreamy smile lighting up the large eyes, her thoughts were far enough away from that spot, and her heart was all aglow with a noble enthusiasm.

"I should have thought you would have been more sorry for Colonel McLeod's departure," said Alice disconsolately. "Why, you are actually smiling!"

Cecil turned to her sister with a half start, as though she had been awakened from a dream.

"Was I?" she said. And then she stooped over Colin, and her bright hair fell like a veil of gold over her soft clear cheek. "Don't you know, Allie, how the Highland women used to send off their soldiers to the wars?"

But Alice made no answer. She did not understand Cecil in the least.

* * * * *

"McLeod! Ah, by Jove, this is the jolliest thing a fellow can see!" was the earnest hearty greeting of Lord Kennedy when, after a day's continuous duty, the Colonel sat in his room writing.

Colonel McLeod had not seen Lord Kennedy till now, and, as that young officer burst into his apartment almost without the ceremony of knocking, he rose quickly and advanced to meet him with outstretched hand.

"I declare I could pitch my cap up in the air!" cried Lord Kennedy, seating himself on the table. "The time seems to pass like lead till we're off. And perhaps after all"—philosophically, though with an under-current of sadness in his manner—"it's only food for the assegais we'll be."

"The chances of war," said the Colonel, with a fleeting smile. "Your people, Kennedy—how do they take it?"

"Like bricks! Aren't they Englishwomen!" replied Lord Kennedy, puffing with suspicious vigour at a cigar he had just lighted. "Fancy my mother turning out at four o'clock in the morning to see me off last week! There are plenty of Spartans among modern women."

"I have left one at Ridinghurst," said Colonel McLeod, who knew his young friend was hovering round the subject.

"Ah!" Lord Kennedy looked up with suppressed eagerness. "Cecil—I can't help calling her that—how does she take it?"

Colonel McLeod was sitting by the table, resting his forehead on one hand. He said now, looking up straight into Lord Kennedy's frank eyes, not answering his question—

"Kennedy, isn't your family intimately related to that of Lord Tredegar?"

Lord Kennedy coloured, looked down, and then said off-hand—

"Yes; my eldest sister's his wife, that's all. What on earth has that to do with Miss Verner?"

"You cannot deceive me, Kennedy," said the Colonel gently. "Did you think it would hurt me to owe this command to you, dear boy?"

For a moment Lord Kennedy sat looking at the Colonel, too much taken aback to speak.

"How did you know?" he said at length.

"I am right, then?"

"You will make so much out of nothing," said Lord Kennedy. "I knew your application had been refused, and I was mad. So, as soon as old Darnley was kind enough to get sick, I worked what interest I had. You see you're a first-rate man, so it was all right; and a certain person out there you know, who shall be nameless, wrote me—I know him—'Why on earth don't we have out McLeod! I wish I had him with my column.'"

The young man paused a second; then he said, turning aside and speaking in a low voice—

"I know you would give worlds to go out, McLeod—forgive me—and I got an idea—I must have it out—you won't be vexed?—after I saw you that day it came back to me—that you had been sacrificing yourself for what you thought would be for Cecil's happiness and mine. I was so taken up with my own selfish feelings that it never crossed me before. If that were so, whichever way it went, you would want tenfold, if that could be, to go out. That's all the truth, McLeod. If I have pained you, you'll know it was unwittingly, and pass it over."

The Colonel in answer only put out his hand and clasped that of the younger man in silence. It was many minutes before he could speak at all.

"Dear noble friend," he said softly, "you will never know quite all that you have done for me. You still trust me, Kennedy! I have felt like a"—he drew in his breath sharply and bit his lip, taking up another phrase quickly—"as though I were deceiving you till you knew this. And I should never have given her a name unredeemed from the breath of dishonour. I cannot say much in thanks for your noble generosity; words are but vain to pay such a debt as this!"

"It's nothing, nothing," answered the young man hastily, as he walked away to the mantel-piece, where he stood silent for some time; nor did McLeod intrude upon what must inevitably be thoughts tinged with bitter pain even to a heart so noble as this. "Well," said the young man at last, turning round, but with a quiver in his voice, "Heaven bless her! And you—I don't grudge you the jewel because I can't wear it myself. She will be happier with you than I could have made her. I don't know that I understood her as you do; though I—— You'll tell her how glad I am?"

And then, without waiting for an answer, Lord Kennedy rattled away about military subjects. The conversation lasted until a late hour, when the two men parted.

Not many days after that the transports stood out to sea; and every heart beat high with hope and longing as each moment bore them onward to the goal where honour and glory might be won.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Fashions for Men.

COATS SHORTER—TROUSERS TIGHTER—VESTS HIGH—THE NEW COLORS.

The tables of tailors are laden with the newest goods, and the mandate has gone forth that there is to be an approach to more plainness of style. Nothing that may be called loud is to be tolerated. As to the materials in imported goods, English and Scotch suitings are to be plentiful. The latest samples show great varieties of Meltons, wooliens, Scotch cheviots, basket goods and diagonals. Meltons are in all colors, and there are many styles of mixed goods from which to choose.

The colors are to be generally more sombre, and certainly not so pronounced as heretofore. Among the mixed goods are some red and black, and with the novelties may be seen what is called an olive green. The green is a delicate shade, and barely distinguishable, and not enough to offend the most stanch Tory.

In regard to shapes there is to be a wide margin to suit the most varied tastes. Tailors agree that there is at present a good deal of individual sovereignty in dress. A man with thin legs will not usually hold himself up to ridicule by wearing the old-fashioned tight pantaloons they used to call "gun covers." Fashions are becoming more and more elastic, and the time has gone by when any fashion plate will be made an iron rule for men. Single-breasted cutaways are to be worn, with an occasional three or four button cutaway where the wearer rebels against one button only. In spring overcoats the prevailing style is loose, buttoned up high, with a tendency to roll over the collars so as to show the silk lining and give a stylish appearance. Prince Albert coats are to be a leading feature, buttoned up high in the neck. The vest will be high, without collar. Some of the young fellows show a disposition to rebel against the Prince Albert coats as better fitted for more elderly persons. Coats for business suits are to be made with small rolling collars to a great extent. Trousers are to be worn rather close fitting to the form of the legs, the bottoms small and shapely. Young men who aspire to lead the fashion favor tight trousers. The tightness will not, however, be carried to an extreme.

Tailors say that a custom is rapidly spreading among fashionable men to leave orders for clothing with merely general instructions to "make it up according to the latest style." This leaves it to the cutter's option or his knowledge of the special tastes of his customer to modify the style to suit particular cases. For exact or extreme fashions there is a tendency to short coats as well as to tight trousers, so that the young men who follow the latest styles will present a very natty appearance. All coats are to be made shorter. There is little change in dress suits, except a tendency to make the coats shorter. The fact is that so few men can afford to wear out a dress coat in a short time that there is positive and effectual rebellion against any sudden or frequent changes in that respect.

Besides the olive green referred to there are among the novel colors blue and olive mixed, brown and olive, and other novel combinations of shades. Business suits for summer wear are to be made of blue Scotch cheviots in skeleton form, rather tighter fitting than last year. As usual, most of the finer imported goods are imitated skilfully in cheaper qualities. A suit that costs $40 at a fashionable tailor's may be bought for $15 in a cheap store. There is a great rush for clothes made to order at low rates, and many low-priced establishments have sprung up all over the city.

Common Sense in Advertising.

(New York Post.)

A model advertisement is designed to satisfy the rational demand of a probable customer to know what you have got to sell. The successful advertiser, therefore, observes three rules: First, he aims to furnish the information which the public wants; second, he aims to reach that part of the public whose wants he is prepared to satisfy; and third, he endeavors to make his information as easy of acquisition by the public as possible.

The commonest and handiest thing in the American family is the newspaper, and, as nearly all the shopping proceeds from the family, from its needs, intelligence, its taste, and its fashions, it follows that the thoughtful and successful advertiser approaches the family by this means. He does not waste his money and his time in loading his advertising-gun and shooting it off skyward in the streets, at all creation, on the chance that some willing customer may be going that way, and may be brought down; on the contrary, he takes account of the advertising ammunition which he has on hand, and loads and points his gun through the columns of some reputable newspaper at the game he wants to hit.

Besides knowing that newspapers are the best means of advertising and how to pick out the best newspapers for his purpose, the successful advertiser fully appreciates the importance of persistent advertising. Mr. Bryant used to say that the great influence of the press depends for one thing upon its power of iteration. Presenting the same subject in many forms, it finally wins attention and acquiescence. Used in this thorough and systematic way, the advertising columns of the newspapers are as useful and essential to the merchant, as means of telling the public what he has to sell, as the clerks behind the counter are to show his goods when the people come to examine them.

The Khedive of Egypt has given orders to the Grand Chief of the Religious Corporations that the ceremony known as the "Doseh" must henceforth cease. The "Doseh" was a procession which took place annually in Cairo in the national ceremony known as "Mewled-el-Nabi," and consisted of the passage of a sheik on horseback over his prostrate coreligionists. The Khedive has also made important modifications in reference to sects who at these ceremonies devour serpents and submit themselves to blows from swords; "in short, for the future these religious fetes will alone consist in the offering up of prayers."

English Farmers in Despair.

THE EFFECT OF BAD HARVESTS AND OF AMERICAN COMPETITION—A HOPELESSNESS OF THE FUTURE.

(From the London Economist.)

It may be from fear of America, it may be from the long continuance of unprofitable harvests, it may be from the rise in the expenditure especially upon labor, or it may even be from increased intelligence, but there is a hopelessness about farmers complaints which experienced men, familiar with their ways, never remember before. They hardly look for any improvement. They do not speak of the bad times as exceptional. They do not, among each other, talk of prices as sure to improve. Above all, they throw up their farms on apparently light provocation. Experienced land agents notice a total difference of tone, an indisposition to haggle, a sort of determination to make none but low offers, and to stick to them. The tenants, as they say, seem not to want the farms, and make offers too low to be entertained, in a kind of spiteful sport. Very often no offers at all can be obtained, and the land is either thrown upon the landlord's hands or goes out of cultivation. The latter occurrence was formerly most unusual in Great Britain, and seems almost impossible; but there is no reason to doubt the statements made that in every county in the south and east large numbers of farms formerly yielding good rents are lying idle, the landlords being unwilling to let at low rents to men who ask long leases, and unwilling to cultivate for themselves or able to bear a temporary loss. We know in our own experience of a district in which eleven farms, poorish to fare as to soil, are deserted and untilled, and have read advertisements of a quite extraordinary character in the way of temptation to tenants. Of farms in the landlord's hands, and of farms broken into two or three, there is no end, while land in modest patches is sunk in value to a degree which suggests a kind of dread among tenants as well as land buyers. There is a feeling of hopelessness, in fact, abroad among farmers of the better class, and of reluctance to remain in the business, which of itself may produce important effects, willingness to farm having been an important element in the trade. It differed from all others in its attraction for a class—those who preferred country life and were content not only with modest profits, but with almost an entire adsence of those chances which in many walks of life are so attractive. Now that willingness has disappeared.

The organizer of this force is Herr Hogemann, a native of Bremen, with whose services the King is much pleased.

AN Italian writer says that our modern millionaires are nowhere in comparison with some of his countrymen, as follows: Mark Antony spent $1,000,000,000 in merely sowing his wild oats. Nero gave $100,000,000 in presents to his friends. Heliogabalus gave a dinner that cost $200,000; the toilet of Agrippina on a special occasion footed up to $1,500,000, and her box of jewels at home was worth $2,000,000.

Parnell seems to have broken himself at last. Was he from the first an honest agitator, or a mere demagogue? Opinions differ. It would be difficult to say which in many respects. However much he loves his country, at anyrate he seems unwilling to run the risk of anything like martyrdom for her sake. For all this we think Parnell was really in earnest to a certain extent at anyrate in his efforts for Ireland, and that his efforts, and the efforts of others, will eventually bear good fruit.

THE Troy treasures of Dr. Schilemann lately exhibited at South Kensington, London, and now presented to the German Government, have arrived in Berlin, and will be displayed in the new Ethnological Museum on completion of that building. The Emperor has addressed to the learned Doctor a letter thanking him in the name of the Empire for the precious and patriotic gift, and expressing the hope that he may further be privileged to continue his unselfish and scientific labors with equal success to the honor of the fatherland.

Cruelty to Cattle on Shipboard.

(London Telegraph.)

If certain rumors respecting the intolerable sufferings to which horned cattle are subjected during their transport from America to this country be founded on fact, it is high time that the board of trade should turn its serious attention to the subject. In all probability strenuous efforts will be, if they have not already been, made by the society for the prevention of cruelty to animals to obtain official protection for the unfortunate creatures doomed to endure the horrors of a long sea voyage with the shambles as its goal, in order that English tables may be plentifully supplied with fresh beef. Under favorable weather conditions a bullock passes its time on board ship in a chronic condition of fear and misery; but "when the stormy winds do blow," and the vessel rolls heavily, the agonies it suffers are such that their mere contemplation for a few seconds might melt a heart of stone. That wilful torture should be permited to aggravate the already unbearable torments to which a severe gale condemns these wretched beasts, appears incredible; yet we have been assured that expedients of such dire cruelty that we forbear from shocking the public by describing them are mercilessly put in practice in order to compel oxen, maddened by sheer physical pain, to leap overboard when the movement of the vessel is so violent as to prevent the possibility of their being dealt with by the crew. It is a significant fact that, within the last few days, a vessel which left the shores of America with a cargo of five hundred and ninety-four live bullocks should have arrived in the port of London with only forty five of its horned passengers, the other five hundred and forty-nine having perished during the voyage "in consequence of heavy weather."

THE late Thomas Brassey, "England's wealthiest son," so far at least as personal property was concerned, was a native of Cheshire, and his sons have lately restored the southeast angle of the cathedral in his memory. Mr. Brassey bequeathed to his eldest son his modest patrimonial estate, a farm in Cheshire, but divided thirty millions of dollars between the three.

A NEW sort of portable fire escape has just been patented, which consists of an arrangement in the form of a large telescope, which can be extended upward, forming a tower reaching to the top stories, and from the upper section of which a door can be opened and a bridge stretched across to the burning house. Over this person can go and descend within the great tube, which is protected by a covering of sheet iron.

NOTICE.

THE Canada Advertising Agency, No. 29 King Street West, Toronto, W. W. BUTCHER, Manager, is authorized to receive advertisements for this paper.

[illegible] year 1881 thus far, has been [illegible] of accidents and sudden [illegible]. One day it is a poor house [illegible] down and several of its inmates perish in the flames. Another [illegible] is a tenement house, and again [illegible] lives are lost. Then comes [illegible] destruction of the Palace Hotel, of Dr. R. V. Pierce, and now an explosion [illegible] a Boiler testing shop, when [illegible] of our fellow men are sent to [illegible] an account of there stewardship [illegible] a moment's warning. The accident was caused by the explosion of a large Boiler while being [illegible]. There were twenty five boilers in the building at the time [illegible] her employers as was also the [illegible] or of the firm. The later [illegible] of the employees were blown [illegible] the street, through the walls of [illegible] and knocked into an unrecognizable mass. Every one in the [illegible] was more or less injured, [illegible] largest portion being either killed [illegible] or are not expected to recover.

[illegible] repeating attempts [illegible] of Russia [illegible] out the [illegible] the Czar. [illegible] of Russia was not all that [illegible] ared in this age of enlightenment [illegible] the late Czar had introduced [illegible] which had greatly ameliorated the condition of the working classes. [illegible] very reforms had made him [illegible] enemies especially his freeing [illegible] serfs from bondage. The Nihilists [illegible] advantage of this discontent, [illegible] been endeavoring to revolutionize [illegible] country and advance their infidel [illegible]. The first step was to get [illegible] the Czar, and we regret to say [illegible] they have at last succeeded. [illegible] Saturday the 12th inst. whilst returning from a military review a [illegible] bomb filled with nitro-glycerine [illegible] thrown under his carriage, which shattered the carriage, but hurt no [illegible]. However the occupants had [illegible] alighted, when another was [illegible] which fell at the Czar's feet, [illegible] lating him in a fearful manner, [illegible] his death in a few hours. [illegible] 20 others were also injured and [illegible] ral killed

[illegible] following remarks are by Mr J. [illegible] Sheldon, one of the English tenant, [illegible] delegates who visited this country [illegible] year, to see what inducements [illegible] held out to the old country [illegible] farmer who wished to emigrate.

[illegible] things in Canada strike [illegible] er powerfully: the vastness of [illegible] country; the unbounded faith the [illegible] have in the future greatness of [illegible] country; and the cheerful loyalty [illegible] the Old Country which is everywhere found. The liberty of the Canadian farmer, grand and unconven[illegible] as it is, and the independence [illegible] mind and of position, considerable [illegible] even complete as it is in many [illegible], do not develop into licence and [illegible] lessness, but into cheerful and [illegible] rous habits of life. Loyalty to [illegible] Old Country and pride in their own [illegible] leading features in the political [illegible] of the people; hospitality to [illegible] rs, and readiness to impart in[illegible] and render services, are [illegible] features in their domestic life; [illegible] living faith in the future of [illegible] Dominion, based on a knowledge of [illegible] exhaustless natural wealth, and of [illegible] inherent energy of its citizens, is [illegible] minent in their conversation. [illegible] is not the aristocracy of [illegible] th, but that of labor and [illegible] brains—personal merit, in fact—[illegible] holds a foremost pl[illegible] estimation of the people."

From a Correspondent.

Mr. Hanbury held his [illegible] for the season on the rink [illegible] was very well attended [illegible] others. Owing to the [illegible] former it would be [illegible] [illegible] where all [illegible]. The race on skates was won by Joseph Atkison, M. Wilson second. The [illegible] race caused great amusement to the spectators, if not to the competitors who had a bad time of it keeping their feet, some of them performing [illegible] sitting posture to an upright one. The race however was won by Wm. [illegible] eterson, Jas. Kershaw second and John McAulay third. The ice was in splendid condition and every one appeared to enjoy themselves thoroughly. It is hardly necessary to say that the affair was a decided success, and the only regrets heard were that it was the last for this season. Mr. Hanbury was as undifatigable as usual in seeing that everything was done for the comfort of both spectators and skaters, which tended not a little to the success of the evening, and I trust next year that there will be more of such pleasant evenings with the same genial proprietor.

Yours &c.,

A LOOKER ON.

FLESHERTON.

From a Correspondent.

SWELL AFAIR.—The swell affair of the season was the social given by the Oddfellows of Dufferin Lodge, No. 186, in the lodge room, on Tuesday evening, the 8th inst. The social was got up more especially for the married people, and we make bold to state that it even eclipsed the one given a few weeks previous for the enjoyment of the young folks. About 8 o'clock the officers and members clothed in regalia, took their respective positions. Bro. W. Trimble occupying the N. G. chair and Bro. H. Hooper the V. G. chair. The meeting was then opened by all singing the opening ode of the order, after which the N. G. gave an address of welcome to the large number who had answered the invitations sent out. The several games and sports of the evening were then indulged in for a considerable length of time, after which a sumptuous repast was furnished, when the tables were cleared a very interesting and instructive programme was rendered, readings were given by Bro. H. Hooper and Bro. M. P. McMaster; recitations by Bro. Blackburn and Clark. Songs by Mr. & Miss Anderson, Misses Philp and Trimble, also a song by Mr. C. W. Morey; Speaches by Rev. Messrs Philp and Savage, Dr. Christoe, Mr. M. Richardson, and Mr. J. W. Henderson, Toronto. After this Bro. W. Trimble again thanked the people for their attendance and hoped that many such evenings would be spent in the the same manner. Before closing we would say that this was without exception the entertainment of the season. Great praise is due the bretheren for the very orderly manner in which the whole evenings amusements were conducted. Among those most noticable in making the company at home were Bros. W. Taimble, W. F. Doll, J. Blackburn, D. Wright, H. Flesher, M. P. McMaster, R. Trimble, J. Sullivan, A. Beattie, W. Bradley and Mr. McPherson, and every one present seemed to enjoy themselves exceedingly. About 12 o'clock, the meeting was brought to a close by all singing the National Anthem. We noticed a large number as they were leaving the Hall, humming the familar old song "Happy to meet, sorry to part and happy to meet again."

BA[illegible].—Mr. J. W. Armstrong has [illegible] into his new brick residence, [illegible] he and his family be [illegible] for many years to come, to enjoy [illegible]. Flesherton now sports a [illegible] and bank, but a bank [illegible] of money in it. We [illegible] is getting tony.... [illegible] social held at Mr. [illegible] th inst, in aid of [illegible] Presbyterian Sabbath School was [illegible] proceeds were $16.... The L. A. A. of the Methodist Church, will hold a social in the basement of the church, on Friday the 18th inst., and on the following Friday the Presbyterians will hold one in the the Town Hall.........No vacant houses in Flesherton.

EUPHRASIA COUNCIL.

A meeting of the Township Council of the Township of Euphrasia, was held pursuant to adjournment, on the 26th February. Members all present. Minutes of last session of Council read and confirmed. Petition signed by J. Deleree Esq., and 28 others, praying for redress of grievance inflicted by Holland Council, on U. S. S. No. 1, E. & H., laid before council. The Clerk was ordered to request the Co. Treasurer, to strike off $4 off the amount of taxes, returned to him, against the E. ½ of lot 4, con. 6, for the year 1880, and to get John Alexander to perform four days statute labor next summer, in lieu of said $4. The resignation of Thos. Reid, as one of the Treasurer's securities, was accepted. The report of committee appointed to enquire the nature of claim made by Mr. Blackwell, for damage to a horse, on the road was laid before council, and adopted, and the Reeve ordered to make defence against any attempt to recover such reported damage, as the claim seems unreasonable and illegal. The Reeve, Deputy Reeve, and Mr. Gilray, were appointed to examine the Auditors' Report now laid before council. The Reeve and Mr. Loughead, were appointed a committee to confer with parties having fences on the old mail road, in order to get the fences removed at an early convenience. The Treasurer was authorized to receive from the Clerk of the court the amount deposited there by R. Myles, in case of Bell, vs. corporation of Euprasia, and to give receipt to said Clerk, for full amount on account of balance being paid. The Township Clerk to furnish the Treasurer with copy of resolutions John Pickerin was authorized to spend $6 for relief of old Mrs. Gray, an indigent. The Reeve to issue money order for said amount. The Reeve, Deputy Reeve and Clerk, were appointed a committee to examine the Collector's rolls for 1877 and 1878, as it is made to appear that there is a mistake in a former report. The Clerk was ordered to notify John Wilson, to return $10, which he re[illegible] from this Council in error. The Reeve was appointed to get side roads 3 and 4 in the 5 concession chopped and cleared 2 rods wide. The Clerk was ordered to notify the Reeve of Holland, that this Council has ap[illegible] Boyd Esq., Heathcote [illegible] in U. S. matters, and [illegible] wish and determination [illegible] therein. Arrange[illegible] into with Nelson [illegible] to arrears of taxes [illegible] roads. On motion of Mr. Gilray and Mr. Boyd, the council resolved to not be responsible for any contracts let in the year 1880, except those in course of completion viz., the jobs let to John Pentland, John Anderson & Joseph Doharty. The time for the Collectors to return their rolls was extended one month. The Treasurer was ordered to remit to J. Rutherford, Owen Sound, $20.70 for stationary and printing. The Reeve's orders were issued as follows, viz.:—To George Crabtree $1 for repairing chimney of Town Hall; James Anderson, $65 salary as Collector for 1880; James Johnston, $14 as Auditor; W. Douglas, $14, as Auditor; R. Dunlop, $6.90, registration fees for 1880. C. Watt, $35, for iron furnished for bridge as per order of John Pentland; $10 was granted for the relief of Mrs. Clark who is indigent and sick. On motion being made and seconded the Council adjourned until the last Saturday in March next.

ROBERT DUNLOP,
Tp. Clerk.

A CASE OF BLACKMAIL.

The preliminary enquiry which took place before the Mayor and three other magistrates into the charge of indecent assault made against Dr. Washington of this town, which was reported in the Mail of the 11th inst., closed last night at twelve o'clock, having lasted since 7.30 p. m. of the 11th inst. The charge was so evidently an attempt to blackmail—the prosecutrix and her husband being compelled to admit several ineffectual attempts to obtain money from the doctor on a promise to hush the matter up—that the magistrates summarily dismissed the case. The assault was alleged to have taken place during a treatment by the doctor for acute flexion of the uterus. The cross-examination of the woman Hall, who made the charge, and who by the way was, until recently, a resident of the United States, was conducted by Mr. Elgin Myers of this town. [illegible] he completely succeeded in breaking down her examination-in-chief and in demonstrating her whole story to be manufactured. Dr. Washington, who is a married man of good standing, and of the most exemplary character, is once more restored to the fullest confidence of the public.

NOTICE.—We wish it distinctly understood, that we do not hold ourselves reponsible for the opinions expressed by our correspondents.

To the Editor of the STANDARD,

DEAR SIR.—I noticed in your last weeks isue an articule in referance to the accident which befel Willie Noble. I think you must have been misinformed regarding the true circumstances of the affair. He did not get hurt while riding, or hanging on a sleigh, as stated as no sleigh was near at the time. The true statement of the case is,—that while coming from School, Willie Wright pushed him down, and then jumped on him, breaking his thigh; after which he (Wright) pushed a boy by the name of Hewitt on him; after this they ran away. This is a true statement of the affair, as was seen by three or four different parties. His teacher Miss Lyons, was the first to assist him while lying on the street.

THE CHILDS GUARDIAN.

IRELAND'S TROUBLES, THEIR CAUSE AND CURE.

BY W. M. CLARK.

Oh Ireland, fair land of my fathers, I love thee,
For thee oft my heart hath in sympathy bled;
Oh! why should opression still hover above thee.
Or why should thy children be crying for bread.

No land upon earth can for beauty surpass thee,
No people more kind, tender hearted and free;
Then why should contention forever harrass thee,
Or landlord and tenant at enmity be.

Thy talanted statesmen, so honored in story,
Thy heroes, the bravest the nations have seen,
Their memory we cherish, untarnished their glory,
Should ever reflect o'er thy valleys so green.

Then, why o'er the range of thy heather clad mountains,
Should violence triumph, or bloodshed be rife;
Should bitterest emnity poison thy fountains,
Thou fairest of lands, that hast given me life.

Oh! charge not thy woes to the Lion of Britain,
In seasons of danger thy strength he has been;
The secret lies deep in tradition's unwritten,
And mysteries dark by the masses unseen.

Thy land hath in darkness so long been enshrounded,
In vain superstition and ignorance deep;
Thy limited area thy sons have o'er crowded
While despots a grasp on their intelects keep.

Give Ireland a free, open bible to-morrow,
And liberty grant to the consience of men;
She'll soon rise above all occasion of sorrow
And quietly rest in contentment again.

Let landlord and tenant acknowledge their duty,
And each set about his own part to improve;
Her happiness soon will outrival her beauty,
And all dwell in loyalty, union, and love.

We've room for thy sons in our glorious Dominion,
With plenty in store for the diligent hand;
Where each may express and enjoy his opinion,
And each as a man in his dignity stand.

We've prairie to conquer, we've forest to level,
And welcome for all who are willing to come;
Escape from contention, so fruitful of evil,
And find in our noble Dominion a home.

Oh! Ireland, fair land of my fathers, I love thee,
I long for the day when thy strife should be o'er;
With freedom's bright star shining brightly above thee,
And thou shalt be torn by dissension no more.

When released by the Gospel from priestly oppression,
With frredom of conscience and unity blest;
Thy sons shall rejoice in their noble possesion'
The land of their fathers in plenty possess'd.

With the yoke of the tyrant removed from thy shoulder,
Thy sons shall arise in the stature of men;
And the sages of Ireland grown wiser, as older,
Shall never submit to be fettered again.

When the loud swelling trumpet from ocean to ocean,
Proclaims the glad tidings, our country is free!
And Ireland released from internal commotion,
More firmly united to Britain shall be.

Flesherton, March, 1881.

Toronto oil company, are sole manufacturers of Castorine machine oil. Infringements will be prosecuted.

Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam contains no dangerous narcotic drug, but is a purely vegetable healing balsam. It cures by loosening the phlegm and corrupt matter from the Lungs and expelling it from the system. Croup, Asthma, Bronchitis, Hoarseness, and all Pectoral diseases yield to it promptly. All dealers sell it.

Ask your dealers for "Castorine" machine oil, and see that the barrel is branded "Castorine," as none other is genuine.

We want the public to understand that we do not take notice of anonymous communications, especially when they are not accompanied by the name of the writer.

"HONESTY IS THE BEST POLICY."—Our daily bread is sweetest when gained by honest toil Hagyard's Yellow Oil is an honest oil, and honestly speaking; it cures more cases of Aches, Pains, Lameness, Stiff Joints, Flesh Wounds, Burns, Scalds, Bruises, Rheumatism, Deafeness, Colds, Sore Throat and Inflammation, than any other remedy offered for sale. No household should be without it.

This is the way they do it up at Wiarton:—

They say, "Oh my! how nice!"

But when they strike a frozen lump

They sing a pean to the stars,
And softly mutter "Moses!"

Impaled.—On Thursday last a strong and hearty young man, about 17 years of age, named Murdock, second eldest son of John McLeod, Nichol, near Elora, was engaged in hauling manure on his father's farm. The sleigh had no sides on, and the load was built narrow and steep. His father cautioned him to take a long turn as one of the team was a colt. The young man was endeavoring to follow his advice, when one of the runners of the sleigh raised up by coming in contact with the manure heap, the young man who was standing upon the load, losing his equilibrium, jumped to save himself. He had not noticed that the manure fork slipped off the load, and was standing prongs upward. Instead of alighting upon the ground he impaled himself upon the fork, where he remained balanced for a few seconds, and then fell over. A younger brother, in response to his cries for assistance, endeavored to pull the weapon from his quivering flesh, but could not. He made a second attempt, the father running towards him and giving directions to pull straight, and was successful. Dr. Savage is in attendance. The tines of the fork entered the back thigh, taking an upward direction toward the body, making four distinct wounds, varying in depth from seven to eight inches.

WOMAN GOSSIP.

A Merciful Provision of Nature Which Keeps Kisses from Showing—An Empress with a Rival—Some Late Vienna Gossip about Royalty—An Unfortunate Flirtation.

Lady Gasford's Encounter with an Enraged Lion—The Dances of Fashionable Society.

Why the Slippers were Never Finished.

The lillies grew beneath her hand
On slippers that are seen no more!
Their race of usefulness is o'er!
They're buried under Time's dark sand,
And nothing can their life restore,
As when in young Love's flowery land,
The lillies grew beneath her hand
On slippers that are seen nó more!

They would—if finished—have been grand!
But she became my wife before
They were half done!—you understand
How, then—though now the work's a bore!—
The lillies grew beneath her hand
On slippers that are seen no more!

Desdemona.

I told her of my three years' cruise,
Its haps and mishaps, and when I
Had finished, in her sweet, rapt muse,
She murmured breathlessly, "Oh, my!"

And when I told my journeys o'er,
From torrid zone the lands of snow,
She paused in wonderment before
She softly cried, "You don't say so!"

And when I told of dangers, fears—
Our shipwreck, when we suffered so,
Half frightened, and almost in tears,
She faltered forth, "I want to know!"

Long scarf pins, with rich, ornamenta heads, are coming into vogue for ladies wear.

Surprise parties are coming into vogue again. The person who is to be surprised issues the invitations through a friend.

We don't just see why a woman should like her mirror better than a man, for the man will flatter her and the mirror won't.

The pretty face of a woman is like a clock's—not much account unless there are good works back of it.

A Philadelphia choir singer is so modest that she always gets it: "As unmentionables the hart for cooling streams."

WELL-BUILT WOMAN.—Analabasterneck, marble brow, and arch expression has been said to constitute a well-built woman.

"Neuralgia" is the charming name borne by a charming girl. Her fond mother found it on a medicine bottle, and was captivated with its sweetness.

"There's that lucky dog, Newwed, who's just married a million!" Tom Tinchacer—"Never marry for money, my boy; but if you meet a nice girl with plenty of tin, try to love her."

The revelations of the two weeks may be regarded as, in a great measure, conclusive in reference to the styles which will obtain in millinery for the spring and summer. For the last eight or ten seasons, in this department of the wardrobe particularly, there seems to have been very close sympathy with nature in its dislike of sameness and in its delight in variety. The millinery that has been recently opened is remarkable in these characteristics. The shapes of bonnets and hats are almost as numerous as the specimens exhibited, and in materials and trimmings we may safely say the variety has never been exceeded.

Dances

The dances of the upper ten this winter, are the waltz, the polka, and the "heel-and-toe polka," with now and then a lancers thrown in as a sop to many fast-dying Cerberi, whose dancing days are supposed to be over, but who hang on tenaciously from year to year, and for the decorous delight of the very few maidens who have been brought up in the still fewer households were round-dancing is yet considered an abomination and an invention of the enemy. The "german" is simply a combination of figures, which allows each couple dancing it a turn every time, and permits them to choose other partners and give favors, but only the three round dances alluded to above are permitted. In certain sets two very popular dances, last winter and this, have been and are the "racket" and "society" waltzes. They need little description, for there are few who have not seen with a shudder the wild jumpings, the frantic see-sawings, and apparent mad frenzy of those who participate in them. Upon the floor of the Pavillion at the garden, or other places at public balls, their devotees can be seen transforming the beautiful waltz, with its slow, gliding movement, into a dance worthy of a low concert-room, and which certainly affords to those objecting to round dances sufficient and strong arguments against them. The fact that they are generally tabooed in respectable drawing-rooms shows their true nature, and a lady who has once danced them seldom cares to repeat the experiment. Their seeming continued popularity is inexplicable but most condemning to those who still indulge in them.

A Kiss on the Sly.

There is to be found much refreshment, in a well proportioned kiss. This everybody acknowledges, though only a frank few have the courage to acknowledge it openly. And it is a curious fact, as yet unexplained by the philosopher, that the slyer the kiss is the more there is in it of refreshment. A kiss that is paid as a forfeit before a whole room full of people is prosaic, not to say embarrassing. The girl laughs, which spoils the romance, and the fellow, ten to one, blushes. Neither of them think much of it, and they both are apt pretty soon to forget all about it. But let the same fellow kiss the same girl when nobody is looking—and the situation is as different as possible. That sort of a kiss, fired off in a hurry behind a door or in a conservatory, is like an electric shock and is as sweet as whipped cream. The taste of it sort of holds on and constantly suggests the propriety—or impropriety, as the case may be—of trying it again. And the laughing and blushing are exactly reversed. The fellow laughs, with spoiling the romance a bit, and the girl blushes like a pink carnation.

It is queer that the very same thing should under such slightly altered circumstances be so entirely different, nor is it any the less queer because the difference has existed from the earliest ages of the world. Kissing on the sly was the rule among the prehistoric races, just as it is the rule now. This proposition is demonstrable by comparative proof. That eminent French savant, M. Elie Berthet, has shown that all the peculiarities of primitive man are represented in the savage races extant to-day. In his exhaustive work upon the "Aboriginal Races of America" Dr. Bancroft indirectly affirms that kissing on the sly is the rule and the converse the exception among our barbarous brethren; and the same is true of those scientifically interesting people, the Australian Maories. From these facts we may reasonably infer that our remote ancestors, the troglodytes, did their sparking in much the same way that sparking is done now-a-days — unobstrusively, and with a good deal of quiet satisfaction. And it is doing them nothing more than justice to add that their heads were what is vulgarly termed "level."

Being thus sanctioned by the customs of the past and indorsed by the use of the present, the mystery that is held to be conducive to comfortable kissing doubtless will endure until the end of time. It is right that it should. Think for a moment what a lot of trouble there would be if this old-fashioned game of addition of lips and division of pleasure should not be accompanied by a discreet silence.

An Empress Fooled

A private letter recently received from an American lady, sojourning in Vienna, contains the following interesting gossip:

We have been very much disappointed this week at the announcement of the postponement of the marriage of the crown prince of Austria with Stephanie, the Belgian princess, for which preparations on a grand scale have been going on here all winter; a perfect carnival season the nuptial week would have been. The postponement is indefinite; the reasons given is the princess' extreme youth; her parents say she is but a mere school-child, not strong, and they fear that the balls and festivities generally given in her honor would be too much for her, particularly as she has not yet been to a ball or anything of the kind. You know royal etiquette obliges her to come to Vienna to be married—her husband being of higher rank, an emperor's son and she only a king's daughter—and, besides, as Austria is a first and Belgium only a second-rate power. Poor little thing, I do not doubt she was so homesick at the idea of coming away off here so forlornly to be married, that her father and mother had not the heart to let her go. Alas! for the fine innumerable costumes of the countesses and princesses which through the kindness of a shopkeeper, or modiste, we are privileged as strangers, to gaze upon—of superb materials, stiff with embroidery in crystal beads, chenille, gold thread, silver, jet and garnet. Among the Viennese modistes there is a good deal of bitter feeling, as the empress sends to Paris for almost her entire wardrobe, and, as she is at the head of fashion there, other ladies of course follow her example, which robs the Viennese of their wealthiest customers.

But they were all pleased just now to hear the following story: One of the leading modistes of the city, hoping to succeed where others had failed, took several of his newest costumes to the empress. With one of the dresses she was enchanted and anxious to purchase it, but his price was more than she thought even she ought to afford. She coaxed him to sell it for less, but, no, he would not; so he departed. All day and all that night she thought and thought about that dress, and the more she thought the more she desired to possess it. So, early in the morning she sent a messenger to the shopkeeper to order the dress. She must have it, and would take it at any price. Alas! the manager returned, looking very woeful, having the shop-keeper's regrets that her majesty was too late, as he had sold it to the emperor the afternoon before. Then she thought: "That dear man, some one has told him I longed for that dress, and he is going to surprise me with it; but he shall not get ahead of me, the dear old duck." So off she drove and bought the finest present she could find, took it to the emperor, and presented it with a sweet speech and smile. He accepted it with utmost grace, showing both his pleasure and surprise. She withdrew, and waited and waited for the expected gift. It came not. Later in the day she learned that her dear emperor had purchased it for, and presented it to, a favorite opera singer. One can imagine the weeping and gnashing of teeth about that time in the Austrian winter palace.

PEARLS OF TRUTH.

THE voice of the majority is no proof of justice.—Schiller.

MANY a man saves his life by not fearing to lose it, and many a man loses his life by being over-anxious to save it.

FEW things are impracticable in themselves, and it is for want of application rather than means that men fail of success.

IN all evils which admit a remedy, impatience should be avoided, because it wastes that time and attention in complaints, which, if properly applied, would remove the cause.

IT is necessary sometimes to refrain from questioning our friends, that we may not draw from them what we ought not to know, and especially that we may not tempt them to deceive us.—Madame Swethchme.

A MAN with a good sound constitution, a good stomach, a good heart and good limbs, and good headpiece, is rich. Good bones are better than gold, tough muscles than silver, and nerves that flash fire and carry energy to every function are better than houses or lands.

ANTICIPATION.—Never anticipate misfortune. Troubles come soon enough without looking to them beforehand; and, moreover, by constantly expecting sorrow and disappointment, we destroy the happiness of the present, which it is our bounden duty to enjoy to the full extent; and troubles that come unexpected are often the least severe.

How Raisins are made in California.

In Mr. Blower's vineyard, Yolo county, the grapes are allowed to remain on the vine until of a golden color and translucent. Then they are picked and put on wooden trays two by three feet in size, placed between the rows, sloping to the sun. When half dried they are turned by putting a tray on top, and by inverting them both, are transferred to the new tray. When the grapes lose their ashy appearance, and after removing the green ones, the rest are put into large sweat boxes, placing sheets of paper between every twenty-five pounds of raisins. They are left there for two weeks, when the stems are tough and the raisins soft. The packing follows, in which iron or steel packing frames are used, the raisins being assorted, weighed, inspected, and made presentable. Mr. Blowers prefers a rich, moist, sandy loam, in a warm climate for raisins, and believes that winter irrigation will destroy insects and keep the vines in a thrifty condition. He prefers to plant vines eight by ten feet apart, or even ten by ten feet, and use fertilizers.

GEORGE ALDRIDGE'S RIDE WITH THE SIX HUNDRED AT BALAKLAVA.

(From the New York Sun.)

A painter who should want a model for a British dragoon, having the front, the form, the seat of a veteran trooper, with clear blue eyes, a beard the color of sunshine, and a modesty that blushes when he is spoken to, might do worse than seek George Aldridge, at Charles W. Dickel & Co's riding academy in West fifty-sixth street.

Aldridge happened to enlist in the 11th hussars, at Brighton, the watering-place, in 1852, when he was 23 years old. Two years later, between 9 and 10 o'clock on an October morning, the hussars were "at ease" in the shelter of what was called French Hill in the Crimea. On the previous day there had been signalling all along the Russian lines, and the allies knew that something was going to be done. The 11th had been reconnoitering that morning with the 4th, the 8th, and the 17th hussars. They formed a light brigade, but there were so many absentees on account of sickness, that the brigade numbered only 680 men. The men were stretching their legs on the ground, and feeling that their part of the work was over for the day. To their right, between them and the black roads of Balaklava, was Earl Lucan's and Lord Scarlet's heavy artillery. Behind them was an approaching body of infantry, but it was yet twelve miles away. It was felt that no move would be made until that ground could be covered with a forced march. It had been found that the Russians were about to move down through a ravine behind Sugarloaf hill, toward Balaklava harbor, where lay the British supplies. Sugarloaf hill bristled with Russian guns. Further in front the Russians had pushed a twelve-gun battery of thirty-two pounders. To the left were the Russian redoubts on a range of chalk hills, but it was the twelve-gun field battery that menaced the road to Balaklava. French hill, behind which lay the light brigade, was a mile and a half from this battery. Between it and the battery was a plain, across which the battery covered the road.

Aldridge was in troop A, on the right of the 11th, which formed the right of the first line, two horsemen deep. He casually noticed Capt. Nolan riding down toward them from Earl Lucan's heavy brigade. He did not give the matter much thought. He saw Capt. Nolan salute Lord Cardigan who commanded the Light Brigade. He could not hear what was said, and did not care to hear it. Soon, however, Lord Cardigan had a long look at the guns over the hill. Then he turned to the brigade, and, as if explaining the matter to a party of gentlemen, said:

"Men, there are the guns (pointing toward the field battery,) and we've got to ... them."

Aldridge says the men all felt that some mistake must have been made. There was no infantry to support them, so far as they could see. But Trumpet Maj. Dan Wall blew the order, "Advance; echelon from the centre;" and the brigade formed and moved forward at a walk up over the hill. The Eleventh and the Seventeenth formed the first line, two deep. Behind the Eleventh, but extending beyond it, rode the Eighth, while the Fourth rode in the rear of the left of the first line, while extending beyond it.

"Here goes the last of the Cardigans," said the leader, as he rode over the hill.

His only brother had previously been killed in a charge in India.

Lord Cardigan six feet high, rode a fiery chestnut horse, with a white off heel. He had the kind of face, Aldridge says, that men love to follow into battle. Beside him rode the trumpet-major; behind him rode his adjutant, while in front of the men rode the captains. The men wore scarlet trousers, and blue jackets. Their breasts glittered with yellow braid and fine rows of gilt buttons. A slung jacket, buckled around their necks, swayed with its dangling sleeves from their left shoulders, while from the tops of their bearskin busbys the bright scarlet bags depended to the shoulder.

Aldridge's size placed him in the front rank, and as the Light brigade trotted into the plain he saw the Russians at their guns less than a mile and a half away; while soon the heavy guns from the redoubts further to the left began to blaze. Aldridge saw troops C. and I. of the Royal Horse artillery galloping upon the left flank. Their guns were soon unlimbered, and poured a shower of shell and canister into the Russian battery. It was partly a cross fire, and it was kept up until the advance of the troopers finally sent off the Russians from their view. So much aid the Light brigade got in their charge.

A few men had quitted their saddles when the order, "Front; form line!" was sounded. This drew the entire body out into one line two horsemen deep. The battery was now feeling their ranks with broken shell and canister. The heavy guns were throwing shell from the redoubts, and Sugarloaf hill was thundering in the distance. "Canter!" was the next order, and then the bugle sounded. "Charge; open order!" The long line drew out from the centre to give space for each man to use his sabre. This was at six hundred yards. The guns of the battery could be loaded and fired now without aim, and the Russians, screened by their foes from the fire of the Royal Horse artillery, made good use of their time. They stood on their guns until their dragoons were within two hundred yards. Then they broke and scattered in all directions. Their work was done. Aldridge saw some of them tugging to get out their sabres as they ran. So hard had they worked on their guns that they had poked the sword-knots, up under their belts behind to keep those weapons out of their way. Many of these were overtaken by the long line of horsemen and sabred. As the brigade galloped through between the guns their order was broken, and thereafter the only order maintained was what came from previous habits of drill. Lord Cardigan was still in front, and that showed every man where he ought to go.

The guns were now silent, but behind them were revealed squadrons of Polish and Cossack cavalry.

"I can see them now," said Aldridge, "in their dark gray uniforms, standing bolt upright in their stirrups, astride of their stunted ponies, and grasping their long spears. These spears had a sharp steel point on the handle end as well as on the other end. This was for service at close quarters."

Through these squadrons, as they stood waiting, the Englishmen made their way. Outside the question of the quality of the men, a reason why the English broke through was that they were better mounted. Their horses were heavier. Some were speared to death, but comparatively few. When they had broken through the lines, Lord Cardigan was seen leading the way back through the open space, and all his men followed him. Had the commanders of the Russian cavalry had presence of mind, Aldridge says, they could have captured every man left alive in the brigade, but they seemed to be struck dumb with astonishment.

Back through the guns again Lord Cardigan led the way. Again one cannon from the redoubts and from Sugarloaf hill stormed at them with shell, and it was not long before the field battery had been remanned and was pouring shell and canister into their backs. The slaughter in going and coming was frightful. Troop A, to which Aldridge belonged, started into charge with one hundred men. It returned with only seventeen alive, and only one man out of the seventeen was not wounded. This lucky man was Farrier Sargeant G. Hash. Aldridge was wounded six times in the lower part of his right leg with pieces of broken shell, but the bone was not broken. He was near the right of the line. His first wound was received in the early part of the charge, at the same time that Col. Maud, who commanded the Royal Horse Artillery, was wounded. Col. Maud afterward obtained for Aldridge a position on the Brighton police force. Before he left the military service he was made a drill sergeant or rough rider. He never drank a drop of liquor, and while he was in the service he was never sick a day. As a policemen, he once captured a wife-murderer, who blew off part of Aldridge's coat tail with the discharge of a horse-pistol in the streets of Brighton. He also saved from drowning a little son of George White, the chief of the Brighton police force. He has a four-clasp medal, on the clasps of which are the words, "Alma," "Inkerman," "Balaklava," and "Sebastopool." He also has a Turkish medal given by the sultan.

Capt. Lefroy, now a clergyman at Boadville, N. Y., is a survivor of the Balaklava charge.

OUR YOUNG FOLKS.

Cousin Charley's Story.

BY MARY HALLOCK FOOTE.

Mamma was just falling into a doze, unconscious of the heavy sea and the ship-wreck so near, but now she roused herself and began a search for the lost animals. The spotted deer had been recovered, against the headboard, and represented the city of New York. It was a stormy passage to New York. The snuffer-tray reeled and rocked, and Japhet, the captain, was lost overboard while trying to rescue the camel and the spotted deer. Robbie met with so many losses that at last he cried out, in his trouble: "Mamma, only one e'fant, and two cats, when there came a rush of footsteps along the hall, and a knock at the door.

"Aunt Helen! May I come in?"

"Walter! Walter!" cried Robbie, bouncing about in the bed. "Oh, Walter!"

Walter was admitted, and joyfully embraced by Robbie, who was now quite willing that Mamma should do whatever she liked. The room was cozily warm, and Mamma took of the flannel sack she had put on over Robbie's night-gown. She put a saucepan of water over the coals to heat, and sat in her low chair, before the fire, watching it.

"Can't you play some quiet play Walter?" she asked. "The bed gets into such a state when you prance about like that. Can't you tell Robbie a story?"

"Oh! I know a story—a good one—Cousin Charley's story. Want to hear a story about a wolf and a fox, Robbie?"

Robbie was ready for anything Walter might propose.

"See! We can play it was right here," said Walter. "Play this is where the wolf lived. He lived in a hollow tree; it was n't a very good place to live, because, when it rained, the rain ran down the trunk of the tree and fell on the bed. Play this was the wolf, Robbie." Walter had selected a yellow-and-white cat from the animals of the ark; and it resembled a wolf from having once had four legs and a tail. The resemblance was now very slight indeed; but Walter encouraged Robbie's faith by explaining to him that it was a "funny kind of wolf. We don't have that kind now."

"Nice wolf," said Robbie. Where's the tree wolf lives in?"

"Aunt Helen, can't you find something we can play is the tree?"

"Will this do, Walter?" Aunt Helen handed him one of the tall, plated candle-sticks that stood on the mantel. "It is light-colored and smooth; you can play it's a beech-tree."

"Oh, yes! But where's the hollow in the tree? Never mind!—we'll play it's on the other side; and the wolf did n't live there long, anyhow. He's just going away now, Robbie, because he had such a bad night with the rain. Here he goes walking through the wood, and through the wood, and through the wood, and over the hill, and by and by he comes to a cave. A great big rock—two rocks, that lean up against each other,—and inside there was a big, dark hole, 'way in ever so far! Oh, Aunt Helen! Please, will you give me the 'froggy' book."

Aunt Helen handed the "froggy" book, ond Walter opened it in the middle, and stood it up against the headboard.

"Well, he came to the cave, and he thought he'd look inside. So he went in and it was a splendid place in there to live. It was pretty dark, but wolves don't mind the dark. It was dry, and warm, and he scraped together a lot of leaves and made a bed, and so he slept there that night, see, Robbie, there's the old wolf in the cave! Hear him breathe!"

Robbie almost stops his own breathing as he peers into the cave, and listens to Walter's heavy snorts and sighs. The story is becoming exciting.

"And now it's morning, and he gets up and he feels lonesome. It's such a big place to live in alone. So he says to himself: 'I think I'll try to find some one to come and live with me. He had nothing to eat but part of a chicken, so it did n't take him long to eat breakfast. Then he went out of the cave and walked around, and walking around, and walked around, till he came to the hollow tree where he used to live, and there he found a fox, sitting in front of the tree. This is the fox, Robbie; it's a real fox, not a play fox; see what a sharp nose it has, and a bushy tail."

The fox was one of the few animals which had escaped mutilation or total destruction in the ark, and the perils of shipwreck afterward.

"Well, old fellow," said the wolf, "where are you living, nowadays?"

'Oh, I'm not living anywhere in particular. I slept here last night, but I shan't try it again.' 'Pretty mean place to sleep,' said the wolf—'I've tried it myself. I've found a first-rate place now; plenty of room for two. Come and see it, and if you like it you can live there with me.' The wolf had heard a great deal about the fox's cleverness. He knew he was n't very clever himself, so he thought it would be a good thing to have the fox for a partner."

"What's 'partner'?" Robbie interrupted.

"Oh, never mind, Robbie! Cousin Charley said partner. It's Cousin Charley's story. Robbie will know what a partner is when he gets a big boy. See, here they go, the wolf and the fox, through the wood, and over the hill, and now they go into the cave together. The fox says it is just splendid, just the very thing he had been looking for. 'All right,' said the wolf; 'make yourself at home.' So the fox scraped together some leaves and made a bed for himself. 'Look here,' said the wolf; 'my cupboard's empty!' Cousin Charley said there was a kind of shelf in the rocks, like a closet, where the wolf kept his food when he had any. Well, he hadn't any that day, so he told the fox he would have to go, hunting, and the fox said he'd go along, and they would divide between them what they caught.

The wolf thought to himself, 'Now I shall live like a lord, for the fox must be a great hunter.' 'Now,' said the fox, 'you go along this side of the hill, and I'll go along the other side, so we wont miss anything, and we'll meet at the cave. I'll wait dinner for you if I get home first, and you wait for me.' So the wolf said he was satisfied with that plan, and he went along the hill,—here he goes,—and the fox goes on the other side.

Now, the wolf had good luck. He had n't gone far when he heard a rustling in the bushes, and he kept very quiet, and what does Robbie think he saw?"

"What he saw!" said Robbie, too impatient to guess.

"He saw a 'itty, bitty rabbit, with long ears and a pink nose."

"Oh, a wabbit! a wabbit!" cried Robbie.

"And the wolf waited quiet in the bushes till the rabbit jumped past him; then he pounced on him and bit him behind the ears."

"Oh, no! No, he didn't!" cried Robbie, much excited. "He didn't bite wabbit!"

"Why, yes, Robbie—that's what Cousin Charley said. He had to, because he hadn't anything to eat. I don't believe it hurt the rabbit—only just a minute."

"Play it was n't a wabbit," said Robbie. "Play it was a big—big——"

"Wild-cat," said Walter.

"Well, yes! A big wild-cat!"

"A Dancing Party."

From the Toronto Truth.

Life is indeed very "fu' o' seriousness," and nowhere we think can the ordinary mind become so impressed with the truth of this important statement, as at a fashionable dancing party. The man who is not sobered by such an experience, must have something abnormal about him, there must be a screw loose somewhere, and we pity him from the bottom of our hearts. The ennobling consciousness of having duty to perform, and the resolute determination to bear all things rather than shrink from the performance of that duty, cannot surely be his, if he is not impressed by the presence of these virtues in the ball-room. For there they flourish in all their perfectness if anywhere, and he who does not carry away with him from the spectacle of the mazy dance, enlarged conceptions of the dignity and grandeur of life, and the importance of having some definite "aim," should be at once pitied and forgotten. For indeed he has missed his destiny, the predestiny of man. We know of nothing so well calculated to throw the requisite mantle of solemnity over all terrestial surroundings, as one of these assemblages.

OFFICIAL BALLS,

we are quite sure have never been fully appreciated in this respect. And from an educational point of view too, they have never yet had anything like full justice done to the undeveloped possibilities of good which we are confident exist in them though unknown as yet and perhaps undreamt of. Let any ordinarily intelligent school boy view the imposing spectacle of grey-haired senators, and elderly females, treading solemnly the mazy involutions of the valse, gliding so gracefully and with such perfect abandon over the polished surface of the ball-room floor, the manly arm of the one meanwhile encircling so reverently the slender waist of the fair one, the look of intense pre-occupation which manifests itself on his countenance, the compressed mouth, the serious eye, the cheeks slightly reddened by the exercise—after the exercise has been prolonged beyond a certain point however, it is very often the case that the mouth of an elderly dancer at any rate, becomes slightly open, as if he experienced some difficulty in breathing. This may be the case with all, but our observations have not extended so far.

THE WAY OLD PEOPLE DO IT.

We have naturally looked to venerable age for our impressions. But to proceed. These things it will be admitted cannot fail to influence ingenuous youth in a very marked degree, and if we might venture to suggest, as so many are doing just now, some educational improvement, it would be that periodical balls be held in some suitable place, the pavilion would do as well as any, to which relays of school children should be taken with all due reverence and sobriety, the performers in these balls being in every case, whatever the province has of excellence either in Law, Medicine, Theology, or the Fine Arts. And above all let the children see grey-headed Statesmen and Senators dance. The Spartans were great believers in object lessons, though in training their youngsters they were as careful to point out what to avoid, as what to imitate. We might safely trust to the good sense of our children, however, that they would not seek to avoid the imitation of anything their elders might do in such august assemblages as these could not fail to be.

THE SKILL NECESSARY.

The sense of intelligent force directed to the accomplishment of an intelligent end, would in such a case be overwhelming, and could not escape the notice even of the most obtuse. The advantages which would accrue to a child from such a course of training, may be imagined, but cannot be described. They would at least be equal, if not superior, to what could be secured by a visit to a menagerie, or any other highly moral and religious "show." The benefits that would in this way result to the whole human race, are incalculable. We hope the Minister of Education may see his way clear to adopt some recommendation of this sort. But we have digressed somewhat. We were trying to describe the appearance which leaders of society so frequently present, when they display themselves in the ball-room, and which so admirably qualifies them to win our admiration and esteem.

A PROMINENT OFFICAL ON THE FLOOR.

A Cabinet Minister, member of Parliament, or other dignitary, making a variety of evolutions in company with a member of the opposite persuasion, his motions laboured, his eye fastened on vacancy, his whole body above the lower limbs, in an alarming state of tension, rigid as a telegraph pole, or bent like a letter Q, his face clammy with a sense of his own dignity, or blushing with the unaccustomed exercise, his lips fixed as for martyrdom, or starting apart to let the struggling breath escape, an aspect of intense seriousness, and realization of the awfulness of existence pervading the whole; —all this we say might but awaken derision in the profane, but in them alone. Light minds these are, on whom serious impressions are impossible.

HOW THE LADY LOOKS.

And then the lady, who shall describe the dignity of her appearance, as she towers in majesty above the head of her gallant swain, or steals a hurried glance beneath his arm-pit, or gazes complacently over his shoulder, with much the same aspect as a ruminating cow. She also looks intensely serious, and a "bystander" instinctively feels that that grand mystery, the "development" of "soul" is taking place before his very eyes. As in the commonplace existence, however, of less exalted natures, the tragedy and comedy lie so frequently side by side, so even in such a typical assembly as we have tried to describe, the imperfection which is inevitably intertwined with all terrestrial things, makes itself felt. Strive after dignity of demeanor as they may, attain to a very considerable extent the object of that striving as they may, there is yet, nearly always, notwithstanding their exertions, something overwhelmingly "funny" about a Ball, and the dancers themselves seem half conscious sometimes that they fail in appearing to the very best advantage.

The Tongue of the Maid of Athens.

Maid of Athens, we must part!
Your will is strong, your temper's tart;
And, when I go and when I come,
Your tongue swings like a pendulum.
Hear my prayer before I go,
Remember 'tis my last request,
And, if you can for an hour or so,
Keep it still and let me rest.

By those banged looks all unconfined,
Blown all about by every wind;
By that curled nose all out of joint,
Like an interrogation point.
Check that tongue's eternal flow,
Oh, heed, I beg, this one behest,
And, if you can for an hour or so,
Keep it still and let me rest.

By those lips that never close;
By those crossed eyes which daunt their foes;
By my bald head, so prompt to tell
What words can never speak so well,
Your tongue is darting to and fro;
You pour forth words like one possessed;
But, if you can for an hour or so,
Please keep it still and let me rest.

Maid of Athens, I am gone;
I'll be at peace when I'm alone.
Yet, though I fly to Istambol,
Your strident tones shall fright my soul.
Can I cease to hear thee? No!
That tongue is heard from east to west;
But, if you can for an hour or so,
Oh, keep it still and let me rest!

Ghosts by the Dozen.

MATERIALIZATIONS BY THE WHOLESALE—EDDY'S ... REMARKABLE EXPLOITS.

(New York Tribune.)

"There will be no seance to-night," said William Eddy, as he came to the door of the house in Eighth avenue in response to the ring of a Tribune reporter. "When will there be another?" "I don't know; we are going away in a few days." "Can't I come in and talk with you a moment?" "Well, there's nobody here but a few friends. I think not." "Have you seen the accounts in the papers about the attempt to expose you the other night?"

This question aroused Mr. Eddy's curiosity. He had heard of the newspaper reports but had not seen them, and he opened the door to learn more about them, but shut it relentlessly in the face of a black-bearded man who stood behind the reporter and said he was going to California soon and wanted to see the spirits before he left New York. In the little front parlor over the meat shop were assembled the members of the household and a few family friends. Horatio Eddy was absent. The party consisted of William Eddy, his cousin Frank, who acts as business manager of the seances, Mr. and Mrs. D, the occupants of the flat, an old Polish doctor, a Frenchman and his wife, a young woman, said to be a medium, and the reporter, whose name and avocation were unknown to the company, and who was received in a friendly way as a confirmed spiritualist.

It was Sunday night, and William Eddy made up his mind that there should be no public seance but only a quiet little affair for the entertainment of the party of friends; so he refused to answer numerous rings at the bell. The reporter determined to adapt himself to the ways of the company, make no attempt at disturbing the ghosts, keep his eyes open and closely observe the performances. A look into the little hall bedroom from which the spirits appear showed the bed had been placed squarely in front of the spacious hall-door, which was besides locked and bolted. It seemed tolerably plain that the ghosts would not come through that door, which, by the way, led into the common hall used by the three families inhabiting the building. As the one window of the room looked out on Eighth avenue the apparitions could not reasonably be expected to enter there.

The theory uppermost in the mind of the observer was that William Eddy disguised himself with clothes hidden in the bed and personated the different apparitions. Some colour was given to this idea by the smudgy, indistinct appearance of the ghosts seen at the previous sitting described in the Tribune. The theory did not stand the tests of the evening's performance, however, as will be seen hereafter, and a new one was developed.

At a quarter after 8 William Eddy went into the hall bedroom and lowered the curtain hanging across the open door. Cousin Frank struck up "The Sweet Bye-and-Bye." A brown paper shade was put over the lamp, but it was still light enough to distinguish faces across the room. No sooner was the tune sung through than the curtain was lifted and out stepped an elderly woman in white with a gray woollen shawl across her shoulders. "Good evening, Mrs. Eaton," said one member of the company after another.

The spook said "Good evening" in a perfectly clear feminine voice and chatted awhile familiarly. By the side of the door hung a key and a clothes brush, which furnished a convenient mark for the reporter to measure the comparative height of the apparitions. The woman was considerably shorter than the medium in the dark bedroom and not so stout. Evidently it was not he. "Turn up the light, Frank," said Mrs. Eaton, as she stepped behind the curtain. The paper shade was removed and out came the ghost again, this time in the full light. Face and clothing were plain enough now. The voice as she talked with different members of the circle had the nasal tone, and the language had the grammatical faults of the colloquial dialect of New England country people.

The most remarkable of the masculine apparitions was a tall, portly man with a large head, bushy gray hair, and long gray beard. He wore black trousers and a dark sack coat, but he had not taken the trouble to put on either his waistcoat or his boots, a neglect of the proprieties which was pardonable from the circumstance that the old gentleman evidently felt at home. He was introduced as E. V. Wilson, a Spiritualist lecturer well-know throughout the country, who died not long ago. Frank said he had been recognized by fifteen hundred people at a Spiritualist camp-meeting last summer. The face was distinct and strongly individual, and a peculiarity of the figure, besides its portliness and size, was the shortness of the arms and a singular awkwardness about the movements of one shoulder. Mr. Wilson demanded a strong light, and, reappearing, delivered a brief lecture in a loud, clear, bass voice. He was sorry there were so few present, and wished those persons who had attempted to expose the performance a few nights ago had come again. "It is well for them that they cannot expose it," he continued, "for if they could, if this is all a humbug, then there is no future life and they themselves are of no more account than the sands on the sea shore." After some further remarks, expressing his pleasure at meeting his friends, the portly gentleman withdrew.

In all of the apparations except two of the children the flesh-tints looked natural, but the eyes were invariably filmy and expressionless, resembling the eyes of a dead person. The drapery looked substantial enough to be real. Frank said he once weighed all the familiar spirits on a platform scale. Mrs. Eaton, a stout matronly person, who looked as if she would tip the beam at 150, weighed only 40 pounds.

The last ghost was the same good-natured Mrs. Eaton, who announced that the performance was over. Scarcely had she withdrawn than Frank pulled up the curtain and out stepped the medium, William Eddy, looking as if he had been asleep. After a few minutes' conversation, Eddy brought a brown cotton curtain from the back room, placed a round table in the corner of the parlor, put a bell and tambourine on the table, and hung the curtain across so as to partition off just enough space for the table. He then sat down in front of the curtain and called the Frenchman and the young woman to sit with him. Cousin Frank then buttoned a long apron around the necks of the medium and the woman which fell over their knees and concealed their hands. Behind the curtain there was not room enough for a man to stand on either side of the round table. The three setters were of course visible, as they sat directly in front of the curtain, which came up back of them to a height of about eighteen inches above their heads. The room was well lighted. Immediately hands were shown through slits in the curtain and the instruments made a racket. A guitar and banjo were handed over the top of the curtain to the ghostly inmates of the triangular space, and were thrust from under the curtain and played upon.

The most interesting part of the performance, however, was the writing of messages upon cards and scraps of paper which were handed with a pencil to the outstretched hands and flung back into the room. Five distinct hand writings were thus produced. Two were evidently the work of illiterate persons, the spelling and grammar being very bad. One message, signed by a woman's name, was written in a beautiful feminine hand. One purported to come from the brother of the Polish doctor and one from the brother of the master of the house.

Now for a theory to account for these mysterious doings. There was nobody behind the curtain—that was shown at a previous sitting, when a newspaper man sprang behind it with the agility of a terrier after a rat, and found nothing but the table and the musical instruments. Besides there was no room for anybody larger than a 10-year-old child. Not one of the thirteen ghosts that came out of the hall bedroom was William Eddy, who was the only person there when the performance began. They might have come through a secret opening in the wall from the adjoining house, but the profits of Eddy's seances would not warrant the expense of hiring two buildings on Eighth avenue, and employing thirteen persons to personate spirits. The reporter, thinking the affair over on his way home, was disposed to fall back on hypnotism. Dr. Hammond says he can make a man believe a broomstick is a pretty young woman, and can set women dandling sticks of wood, supposing them to be real babies. Why should not the power of hypnotizing subjects be extended so as to embrace a room full of people and make them fancy they see and hear materialized spirits? True, the reporter did not feel hypnotized. He thought he was wide awake. He joined in singing the Sunday-school hymns, talked with the ghosts and was vastly entertained. But maybe he was mistaken. Perhaps the whole company were in a magnetic sleep, and only fancied themselves awake. In any case it was a queer performance.

Bertha Bandoline's Romance.

BY WILKIE COLLINS.

It was a dreary November day.

From the gray sky, over which swept vast masses of leaden coloured clouds, came a steady, descending rain, which beat down upon the earth in a pitiless way, making the stone line of utterly cheerless gloom. Drip, drip, drip, came the cold drops from the eaves, and before they reached the ground were joined by other drops that had plashed against the window panes in a vicious way, only to be beaten back and sent to join their mates that had attached other portions of the house with equal nonsense.

It was a modest little structure this, against which the entire forces of the elements seemed to be combined, but although small, it had a determined look, and stuck its various angles and sides out into the storm in a calmly defiant way.

In a cosy little room of the cottage sat a girl of nineteen summers and about 400 falls. The excess of fal's were due to the extreme length of the skating season the previous year. Bertha Bandoline was a proud, sensitive girl, who instinctively shrank from publicity of any sort, and the first time the ice came up and met her, she sat there calmly for an instant, and then rose, saying softly to herself, "I've broken my bustle."

Warm words of sympathy and affection came from those around her, but she only smiled sadly, and went home a wiser but bustleless girl. The next day her father received a bill for a new bustle. He looked at it for a moment and thought of the days gone by when Bertha would climb on his knee as he sat before the glowing grate, and after pulling at his beard and saying how much she loved papa, would fall asleep in his arms, the flickering blaze of the fire making strange lights and shadows around her head, with its tangled masses of yellow hair that lay upon his shoulder. She still sat in front of the fire, with her head in the same place, but the shoulder belonged to another person.

"My daughter is very dear to me," said the old man, as he paid the bill.

Unconsciously he had told the truth.

Bertha is still sitting in her boudoir. Boudoir means room, but it is more high-toned. Kind words cost nothing, and even being good to yourself keeps you in practice. The rain still fell. "It is the threnody and dirge of my happiness," said Bertha in a low, despairing voice. "Rupert will never love me again. It seems as if he had sailed away in the ship with the lights and the music and the merry passengers, and left me all alone on the dark waters in an oarless, sailless boat beneath the midnight sky."

Bertha did not know what threnody meant, but slung it in at random. But we can forgive this. She was often too previous in her language. All must pity a young heart torn by conflicting emotions, hesitating between faith and doubt in one it loves. Who can paint the blackness of a nature that would betray a trust so sacred? Is not its possessor worthy of eternal damnation?

I should smile.

But while Bertha sits enshrouded in her own sombre thoughts and forebodings, where is the object of her passion?

In a gilded haunt of sour mash stand two young men. On is Rupert, the other is Jim.

"Jim who?" do you ask. Never mind. A glittering bauble is spinning on a surface of polished wood.

It is a quarter.

Finally its revolutions cease. The young men bend eagerly over it.

"You've lost, Jim."

"Oh?"

"Give us the same as before"—this to a man behind the counter. In another instant a tiny glass went to Rupert's lips

Does he love Bertha?

I cannot tell a lie—I don't know.

How Many Apples did Adam and Eve Eat?

Some say Eve 8 and Adam 2, a total of 10 only.

We think the above figures entirely wrong. If Eve 8 and Adam 8 2 certainly the total will be 90. Scientific men, however, on the strength of the theory that the antediluvians were a race of giants, reason something like this; Eve 8 1 and Adam 8 1 2; total, 163.

Wrong again. What could be clearer than if Eve 8 1 and Adam 8 1 2 the total was 893?

If Eve 8 1 1st and Adam 8 1 2, would not the total be 1,623?

George Washington says Eve 8 1 4 Adam and Adam 8 1 2 4 Eve; together they got away with 8,938.

But if Eve 8 1 4 Adam, Adam 8 1 ; 4 2 oblige Eve. Total, 82,056.

We think this however, not a sufficient quantity, for though we admit that Eve 8 1 4 Adam, Adam, if he 8, 0 2 8 1 2 4 2 keep Eve company. Total, 80,282,056.

Everybody is wrong again. Eve, when she 8 1, 8 1 2 many, and probably felt sorry for it, but her companion, in order to relieve her sorrow, 8 1 2, Therefore Adam, if he 8 1, 8 1 4 2 4 2 fy Eve's depressed spirit. Hence both ate 81,896,054 apples.

Railway Prizes.

Mr. Hinton R. Helper, a wealthy resident of St. Louis, and well known throughout the country as the author of the "Impending Crisis," some time ago offered $5,000 in prizes for three prose articles and two poems in favour of the construction of a double track steel railroad through the centres of North and South America. The prizes have been recently awarded as follows: First prize, $1,300, to F. R. Hilder, of St. Louis; second prize, $1,200, to Fred. A. Beelen, Cortland on Hudson, N. Y.; third prize, William W. Archer, Richmond, Va.; fourth prize, $1,000, F. D. Carpenter, Washington, D. C.; fifth prize, $500, F. A. Deekens, Norwich, Canada. The first three were in prose and the last two in poetry. They are to be published in pamphlet form.

Pebbles Spotted With Gold.

Newsfrome Cassair, British Columbia, reports everything frozen up. Provisions are plentiful and cheap. A few mines are running tunnels on the Takou Auk quartz ledges. The news is very exciting. The washed pebbles, as well as the large boulders found in the creeks, are streaked and spotted with gold. A town called Harrisburg has been started near the diggings and several houses and stores and a steam saw-mill are under way. It is supposed that the ledges will be traced into Canadian territory.

Sphinx heads, Egyptian beetles, asps, obelisks, pyramids, and lotus designs will be the favourites in bonnet and hat ornaments.

A TORONTO husband has kept track the past year of the number of times his wife has threatened to leave him, and the figures are 121. She is there yet, however.

AN editor, the day after experiencing religion, wrote: "The storm last Wednesday caused great d—age in H—rtown, Pa. A man named G—drey was dangerously injured."

ONE of the most beautiful models in Paris is a young woman who comes from the blue-grass region of Kentucky. She was deserted by her husband abroad, and she now supports herself by posing.

THE "rock-a-way," according to the London World, is the latest variety of the waltz. It is largely patronized by the indolently inclined. It derives its name from the swaying motion produced by changing the foot on the first note of each bar only, and is a lazy development of the old "hop" waltz.

The head of brakeman Snodgrass of Corry, Pa., once round, is now long and slim. While he was making a coupling his head was caught between the bumpers, and so horribly squeezed that it is lengthened. He is cross-eyed and an inch taller, but he will recover, and his intellect is as clear and as bright as ever.

The South African Dutchmen have given their British friends more trouble than was expected. These slow-going, plodding, somewhat easy and good-natured people, you know, when they do get their dander up, are no joke by any manner of means. The Boers seem to have much of the spirit of their forefathers, the famous Dutchmen of the great Republic.

There are some very straightforward people in Toronto. One of them went into The Telegram office, and sauntering up to the desk, asked: "I hear that the bible has been revised. Do you know if many important changes have been made?" "A good many, I believe." "Then there is no mistake about Ananias being struck dead for lying?" "No, I believe not." "Well if I was you I would find out about it," and he strolled out as unconcernedly as you please.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla Is a compound of the virtues of sarsaparilla, stillingia, mandrake, yellow dock, with the iodide of potash and iron, all powerful blood-making, blood-cleansing, and life-sustaining elements. It is the purest, safest, and most effectual alterative medicine known or available to the public. The sciences of medicine and chemistry have never produced so valuable a remedy, nor one so potent to cure all diseases resulting from impure blood. It cures Scrofula and all scrofulous diseases, Erysipelas, Rose, or St. Anthony's Fire, Pimples and Face-grubs, Pustules, Blotches, Boils, Tumors, Tetter, Humors, Salt Rheum, Scald-head, Ring-worm, Ulcers, Sores, Rheumatism, Mercurial Disease, Neuralgia, Female Weaknesses and Irregularities, Jaundice, Affections of the Liver, Dyspepsia, Emaciation, and General Debility. By its searching and cleansing qualities it purges out the foul corruptions which contaminate the blood and cause derangement and decay. It stimulates and enlivens the vital functions, promotes energy and strength, restores and preserves health, and infuses new life and vigor throughout the whole system. No sufferer from any disease which arises from impurity of the blood need despair who will give AYER'S SARSAPARILLA a fair trial. It is folly to experiment with the numerous low-priced mixtures, of cheap materials, and without medicinal virtues, offered as blood-purifiers, while disease becomes more firmly seated. AYER'S SARSAPARILLA is a medicine of such concentrated curative power, that it is by far the best, cheapest, and most reliable blood-purifier known. Physicians know its composition, and prescribe it. It has been widely used for forty years, and has won the unqualified confidence of millions whom it has benefited. Prepared by Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Practical and Analytical Chemists, Lowell, Mass. SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS EVERYWHERE.

Sioux Indians.

SOME ACCOUNTS OF THEIR SOCIAL RELATIONS AND SUPERSTITIONS—THE CUSTER MASSACRE.

(Deadwood Pioneer.)

On Sunday last a Pioneer reporter enjoyed a lengthy conversation with Joe Hoskiss, lieutenant of Indian police, stationed at Cheyenne river agency, who is now in attendance as a witness upon a United States district court. Joe is a half-breed, who has lived with the Sioux a greater portion of his life, yet he is a very intelligent person and a ready and entertaining conversationalist. He was educated at St. Louis, speaks several languages fluently, and has had extensive experience on the frontier.

The Sioux are very superstitious, are controlled by legends in whatever they do, and never embark in an undertaking without first having the assurance that they are in the right. In their way they are a very religious people, cherishing the greatest respect for the rights both of property and person, of every member of the tribe. The chastity of their women is also noteworthy, and even their mode of warfare is in accordance with the teachings of the great spirit. True, they are often accused of great atrocities, but if history was searched, it would be found that members of the tribe had suffered similar torture and death at the hands of the whites, the circumstances of which had been remembered and retaliated at the first opportunity. The Indian has the utmost reverence for the "Great Spirit," but no belief in the existence of an evil one. They use no profanity, nor anything corresponding to a white man's oath. Their ideas of the hereafter are vague, but impressive nevertheless.

They belive that every act and episode of life below will be repeated in the "happy hunting grounds," even to the minutest details, hence the burial of implements of war and toil with every deceased.

Probably one of the noblest actions in Indian history was the rescue, in 1862, of eight persons—two women and six children—from the Santee camp, at the mouth of Grand River, by Four Bears, now in this city. The captives were adopted into the tribe, and one, Julia Wright, forced to marry a son of Black Hawk, then a prominent chief. Four Bears procured their liberation partly through purchase, (giving four horses,) and partly by strategy, and after passing through many perils, returned them to their homes. For this noble act Four Bears was promised remuneration by congress, but the promise has never been fulfilled. During his recent trip to Washington he brought the matter before Secretary Schurz, when assurance was again given that the reward would soon be forthcoming.

The relation existing between members of a family are very peculiar. For instance, brothers and sisters do not fraternize—are very distant—scarcely recognizing each other. Mothers-in-law are also ostracised immediately upon the marriage of their children.

Marriage is nothing more than purchase and sale, negotiated by the nearest friends of both parties, but the relations assumed are considered sacred, and are seldom violated.

The Custer massacre, in which many of the Cheyenne Indians participated, is seldom mentioned, and never only in the most cautious manner. It was not at the time considered a victory, nor is it remembered as an event reflecting honor upon the tribe. On the contrary, such few accounts as have been gleamed from those who participated, indicate that a route of the Indians was nearly accomplished, and would have resulted had Reno not shown the white feather. His Battle, head warrior of the tribe, is very emphatic in his denunciations of Reno, and says that Custer's death and many of his command is attributable to his (Reno's) cowardice. A map is now being prepared at the agency showing the position of the Indians, both when the charge was made, and soon after, when Reno attacked from the south. Custer led the charge to the head of the draw and ordered a volley fired into the lodges opposite. Immediately two thousand braves arose from the sage brush in the rear of the soldiers and began their terrible work. Custer gave the order to about wheel and charge, and, with the three hundred, galloped toward the foe. The latter were too numerous and too thoroughly armed; the onslaught was checked; the enemy came up with a yell: the field became a scene of the wildest confusion and death. Custer's horse fell mortally wounded, and as the gallant officer endeavored to extricate himself from the entanglement a bullet passed through his leg, and, while sitting there bewildered, faint, and helpless, a boy quietly approached from the rear, and delivered a death-blow with a clubbed rifle. The battle was over; annihilation was complete, and the search for plunder began. Almost the first body examined was that of the heroic officer, from whose pockets they took a package, carefully opened it, and beheld the long auburn locks so characteristic of the general, and which had been cut only a day or two before. The Indians at once recognized their victim, and, respecting him in life, they respected him then. The body was covered with a blanket and left, unmolested. The Indian loss was very heavy,—exactly how great is not definitely known,—but Joe believes that it equalled our own.

Sir Charles Tupper it seems, is going to England to recuperate. I often think what would take place with Canada supposing four or five men, who have all lately been sick, were to shuffle off this mortal coil. Suppose Tupper and John A. on the one side, and Alex. Mackenzie and Blake on the other, were to make tracks for the shadowy land, who could be found to fill their vacant chairs? For the life of me, I could not say, nor do I believe any other person could. It is of no use to say that there are plenty of capable, but untried men. Where are they? The mischief is that a large number have been only too well tried, and have been found incurable mediocrities. And yet they would fight for place and power, like Kilkenny cats, as soon as their present leaders were under the clods. Oh well, perhaps it is time enough to speak of all that when the men are actually dead.

The New Birth.

HERMAN MERIVALE.

... Of old from Sinai's hill;
And the mystic words of wonder
Thrill the believer still;
He sees in the vault above him,
With the eye of Faith alone,
Crowned round by the souls that love Him,
The great Creator's throne.

He sees,—in the day of danger,—
The column of cloud that led
From the land of the alien stranger
His Israel whom He fed;
And knows,—tho' his footsteps wander
Astray in a twilight land,—
That his home is building yonder,
By the one unerring hand.

He sees,—in the night of peril,—
The pillar of fire that shone
From the halls of pearl and beryl,
To light God's children on;
And feels that straight from heaven
When the eye of sense grows dim,
Shall a grander light be given
To all who trust in Him.

On the page of the mighty Ocean
He reads the mightier still,
Who curbs its restless motion
By the law of His loyal will;
And while its course diverse
It murmurs, or sings, or raves,
He lists to the voice Eternal,
In the language of the waves.

He marks in the plants around him
The throbs of a life their own,
While the wordless worlds that bound him
Whisper their undertone.
From the hawk and the hound yet clearer
He hears the secret fall,
Which nearer to him and nearer
Brings the great God of all.

In the leaves that blow and perish
In the space of a single hour,
As the loves that most we cherish
Die like the frailest flower,—
In the living things whose living
Withers or e'er they bloom,
He reads of the great thanksgiving
Which breathes from the open tomb.

The bright Spring leaves returning
To the stem whence Autumn's fell,—
And the heart of Summer burning,
To change at the Winter's spell,—
The year that again repasses,—
The grain that again revives,—
Are signs on the darkened glasses
That bar and bound our lives.

I know how the glass must darken
To my vision more and more,
When the weak ear strains to hearke
When the faint eye glazes o'er;
But the glass shall melt and shiver,
Once kissed by the fighting breath,
And the light beyond the River
Shine full in the face of Death.

Strong-set in a strong affection,
We look to the golden prime,
When a mightier Resurrection
Shall burst on the doubts of Time;
And the thoughts of all the sages,
Like the waves of the fretful main,
At the base of the Rock of Ages
Shall foam and fume in vain.

HIS VICTORIA CROSS

By the Author of "A STRANGE WEDDING-EVE," "CLARE STANHOPE'S DIAMONDS," &c.

"Back, McLeod! In Heaven's name back! 'Tis too late! 'Tis certain death!"

Colonel McLeod gave no more heed than if those voices that would fain have detained him had been idle puffs of wind; perhaps indeed he scarcely heard them as he dashed back among the yelling savages, who, still flying before the pursuit of the Lancers, assegaied those who came in their way.

Riding back with two other officers when the pursuit was almost over, the Colonel had paused to see that none were left behind, and in that keen swift glance he had seen one face, the sight of which had sent a wild thrill to his very heart.

Not one second did he pause, but turned and dashed back. It all passed in less than two minutes.

They saw him one second alone surrounded by Zulus. They saw the gleam of steel as his sword dealt death at each blow, and, before the two men could reach the spot, quickly as they spurred to render help, the Colonel rode out, supporting before him the well-nigh senseless form of a trooper of Lonsdale's Horse.

"McLeod, by Heaven you have a charmed life!" cried Lord Kennedy, who was one of the officers with him. "You haven't left one of the wretches. But," he added hastily, "you are wounded!"

"Hush!"—and Lord Kennedy started, and looked with a half-questioning glance into the noble face that bent over the wounded man before him, so changed and hoarse was the sweet clear voice. "It is nothing—a flesh wound. We must ride back as quickly as we can; the man is badly wounded."

The Colonel drew a sharp quick breath, and Lord Kennedy heard the almost agonised whisper—

"Oh, Heaven, is it too late, after all!"

* * * * * *

"It's a question of hours, Colonel. At most he may live that; but, as to recovery——"

And the surgeon glanced towards the pallet bed on which lay perfectly motionless the slight form of the man Colonel McLeod had rescued, and shook his head.

Then he glanced covertly into McLeod's face, which was hardly less deathly white than that of the dying man. He wondered why Loris McLeod should feel such a deep interest in the trooper, why he had brought him to his own tent instead of taking him to the ambulance, and had lavished on him every possible care.

"I knew that from the first," said Colonel McLeod in a cold measured voice that betokened a very tempest of feeling suppressed; "you have done all you can; I shall not forget it. Will he be conscious?"

"He is conscious now," replied the surgeon, glancing over towards the bed; "his eyes are open; he is sensible."

McLeod turned quickly, and a sudden flush crossed his cheek. With one step he was by the man's side, and he bent low over the ghastly face; one gentle hand was laid on the fair matted locks that lay damp on the man's brow.

With a sharp cry the man pressed one hand to his forehead, and a wild look of horror and dread crossed his face as he saw, as through a mist, the face beside him.

With an almost superhuman effort he raised himself on one arm and so remained, making convulsive efforts to utter some word, that only resulted in a half-articulate whisper.

"You here? Have you come to denounce me now? Oh, it has been a living death—your scorn——"

But the Colonel's right arm was passed round him, and the quivering form was drawn to his breast.

"I have not come to denounce or to scorn, only to remember that my brother is given back to me once more," he said in low steady tones. "Archie, oh, Archie, rest here; trust the love that has lived through all!"

His voice faltered and broke; he could only bow his head in silence and strive with the agony that for one moment must have way. He thought of the days long ago, when his darling fair-haired brother had twined on his breast and had made a thousand plans for the future, and hopes for a bright future. Oh, bitter, bitter memories now, when his brother lay there once more, heart-beating unto heart, after twenty long years, wounded unto death, in the camp at Ulundi!

Exhausted, Archie McLeod lay for many minutes perfectly still, the horror and dread slowly dying away from his face as he instinctively gave way to that all-conquering power of love that seemed to enfold him and shelter him. But, after a brief space, he opened his eyes.

"Who is that?" he whispered, half raising his hand to point to the erect figure of the surgeon, who had drawn back in wondering silence, but who now stepped forward.

"Don't you know me?" he said, bending down. "Doctor McAlister? Yes, I see you do. You're not in pain now, are you?"

"No"—faint and scarcely above a whisper came the answer; "but, you know, Doctor, that's not for long. I'm getting numb; you needn't tell me I'm dying. How long?"

"You haven't many hours, my poor lad," said Doctor McAlister kindly. He glanced toward the Colonel as he spoke. "Have you known this man, Colonel?" he asked in an undertone.

"Ay, I know him!"

Only four words—so simply, so softly uttered, yet they outlined a life's unutterable woe.

The surgeon somehow could not find words to answer. Just then Archie spoke.

"Doctor, give me something to give me a spurt. Can't you?"

McAlister poured out a strong cordial and gave it to the Colonel. Archie swallowed the liquid eagerly, and in a moment seemed to rally.

"I want you to do something for me, Doctor," he said, speaking slowly, but more clearly. "You wonder at all this. Didn't Loris McLeod bring me out from those confounded Zulus?"

"Yes, at infinite risk. What then?"

"Well, I'm glad he did; not that I love life—it's a curse to me; but that was paying back good for evil—eh, Loris?"

"He wanders," said the surgeon, half interrogatively; but Archie roused himself, knitting his brow.

"Not at all," he said hastily. "Don't you think I've not my senses about me. Go, Doctor, if you want to do the last service a dying man'll ask you, and fetch the General—our General, you know. Be quick; tell him I've something to say to him—to go, you know—go to—to the Horse Guards."

McLeod almost sprang to his feet with a smothered cry.

"No, no, Archie! Forbear in Heaven's name—not that! McAlister, stay!"

"Go—quick, quick!" the younger brother gasped, clasping tightly Loris's right hand. "Don't mind him; he mustn't suffer any more. Tell the General he must come."

McLeod sank down with a deep groan.

"I have suffered, and can still suffer," he whispered, his voice hoarse with agony. "Save honour still, Archie."

But the surgeon had gone; and that clasp of Archie McLeod, powerful only because it was so weak, held the Colonel; and the dying man looked up with almost a smile.

"It's the only way I can die easy," he said. "I have been a coward. I ought to have confessed it all long ago; but I was afraid, and I dreaded facing the outcry and then—death!" He shivered and closed his eyes. "Well, it's come now without my doing; but, Loris, I have been fighting for the old country. You never knew I was in the Flying Column, did you? You're not with that, are you? I saw you, but I couldn't face you, Loris, only say once you forgive me for that."

"Who am I that I should judge you, Archie?" said Loris. "I do forgive you." Then he added, with quivering lips, "Archie, if you love me, spare me this last blow."

"No, that I can't do," replied Archie; "my life is going. I've pretty well spoiled yours for you, and you shan't suffer any more for that affair. It's tardy justice," he added, with a heavy sigh.

He lay back perfectly quiet for some minutes on the cushion that supported his head; then he moved again restlessly.

"Is—you know, Loris, what I told you about the Sepoys using threats to make me betray Gherutpoor. Oh, how you start at the very word! I don't mean that was an excuse. I did shrink from doing that, though I was so friendly with the chiefs. I managed to let you know. I wouldn't have done so much for any one else; I didn't know there would be such a flare-up over it."

"Never mind that now, Archie," said the Colonel in a low voice, laying his hand tenderly on his brothers forehead; he could only remember that he was dying, the long years of shame and sin seemed somehow unreal and mists; and still withal there was a sense of being sharply wounded and stung. "Unless it be to ask Heaven's mercy for that sin."

Archie turned his face away with a groan.

"Ah," he said bitterly, "that's no good! I don't believe, and you don't, in a fellow living a coward's life and squaring it all up in an hour when confession can't hurt him. Remorse isn't repentance. Ah—there is some one! Loris, stay."

For, with one bound, Loris McLeod had reached the entrance to the tent, across which a curtain was drawn. He set his teeth, and there was an almost desperate look in the large bright eyes as he stood there in the opening and met the half-inquiring gaze of his commanding-officer, who was accompanied by Doctor McAlister.

"The man is dying," said the Colonel; "it is useless to trouble you, Sir Everest; he is not fit to see anyone. Forgive me if I ask you not to enter."

"My dear McLeod, forgive me if I disregard your wish," answered Sir Everest, laying his hand gently on the Colonel's arm. "McAlister has told me what he witnessed and what the wounded man said. There is some grave mystery here which ought to be cleared up. It is plain you have been suffering for the deed of another man; and it is my duty to help to remove a stigma from the name of one of the bravest officers who ever served the Queen."

He spoke gravely and gently; but through all there was a ring of command which, even in this moment of desperate conflict, Loris McLeod, loyal to that obedience which was a creed with him, could not disregard. There was a second's dire struggle; then he bowed his head in mute acquiescence and drew back for the General to pass.

But he was as white as the man from whom the life was slowly ebbing, although calm outwardly.

"Stay one moment," said Sir Everest, as the surgeon passed on to the pallet with some cordial for Archie which should give him temporary strength. "McLeod, what is this man to you?"

"He is my brother. Spare me more."

Loris stepped to his brother's side and knelt down, putting his arm round him, that Archie might lie more at ease supported on his breast. Then Archie spoke in slow low tones, pausing every now and then to draw his breath.

"I'm glad you've come, sir," he said, raising his dim eyes to that kindly face on which every man in the Flying Column looked with such pride and affection. "There's right to be done; and I know you'll see that Loris McLeod, my brother, has justice at last. Take down all I say, and I'll sign it, if I can, in your presence; then it'll be all right."

McAlister fetched writing-materials from the place the Colonel indicated, and wrote down, as Archie McLeod spoke, that confession of bitter shame and wrong.

Not once did Loris McLeod move or speak; his head was bowed, his eyes drooping, but his white lips were compressed, and his teeth set as in a vice; only such signs were forced from him by an agony that had scarcely been greater when he had heard in the flush of youth that hope was ever for him.

Sir Everest stood with folded arms listening to the strange tale which he heard with mingled emotions—deep thankfulness that a brave and noble life should be cleared, and sympathy and sorrow for that man's suffering.

Archie told nothing, nor did he make any palliation of his crime. He told the story of the betrayal of the Indian fort simply and truly.

"Now give me the pen," he said, when he had concluded, and his voice was becoming ... "let me sign," and he half raised himself, speaking in gasps and fixing his glassy eyes on the General with an almost wild entreaty. "You'll send—see him cleared——"

"I swear that I will carry out your wish to the uttermost," answered Sir Everest, with quiet solemnity. And then the surgeon brought the paper and pen.

"Lift me, Loris. You must guide my hand."

A shiver ran through every fibre of the Colonel's frame; but he nerved himself with a fierce effort to the task, raising the form that lay so heavily against him and putting the paper before him. Archie stretched out his hand for the pen. The fingers that held it were almost nerveless. He looked up entreatingly, that look pleading more powerfully than the whispered "Guide my hand, Loris."

Loris took the cold hand in his warm clasp; his fingers lay on the bueless ones that held the pen. It was brother guiding brother to sign to his dishonour. His breath came quickly, a mist rose before his eyes, and his hand fell.

"I cannot!" he said hoarsely.

There was a moment's intense silence. The far distant challenge of a sentinel as the officer went his rounds could be distinctly heard. Sir Everest touched the Colonel gently.

"McLeod," he merely said; but the word was enough.

With a kind of desperation Loris McLeod nerved himself one more. He took Archie's hand without faltering, and guided the pen that slowly traced for the last time the name "Archibald Cameron McLeod."

"Cameron McLeod!" said Archie, with regretful bitterness, as the pen dropped, and he lay back exhausted in his brother's arms. "The mother's name! He is noble enough to wash out the stains I've brought on it!"—half questioningly to the General, who bent and signed the document with McAlister, as witnesses.

"Aye," he answered in a deep low voice, "there lives no nobler man on this earth than Loris McLeod!"

"Yes, that's true," muttered Archie; and he smiled. Then a new eagerness came into his face, and he half raised his hand. "General, one thing—I sha'n't serve you any more, you know. Will you mind shaking hands just this last time? I have fought for England. I have not shrunk from my snare, have I, sir?"

Almost too deeply moved for words, Sir Everest clasped Archie McLeod's hand in his.

"I do not shrink from holding your hand in mine," he said falteringly. "You have always done your duty as long as I have known you. May Heaven forgive you!"

Then Sir Everest turned and touched the surgeon.

"Come away," he said softly. "Leave them together at the last."

* * * * *

Hours afterwards, when the cold gray dawn was breaking, and the reveille sounded, and all the camp burst suddenly into the life of a new day, Loris McLeod was found to answer the call, rising from that long, long vigil, of which each second was freighted with a life's anguish. And Archie McLeod too had answered the reveille that called him to arise in the dim darkness and go forth to the Unknown Land.

CHAPTER X., AND LAST.

The news spread like wild-fire through the camp that the Archie Lovell of Lonsdale's Horse, who had just died of his wounds, was not "Lovell" at all, but Colonel McLeod's brother.

It would not have been possible to keep that secret, all the circumstances attending his death being so unusual. And Sir Everest deemed it only right and just that the Commander-in-Chief and all those who knew Loris McLeod should be acquainted with the facts of that mystery which had been an everlasting puzzle to those who had served in the Mutiny.

And, after all, what did it matter? All the world would know it soon. Sir Everest had sent off Archie's confession with the despatches that very day. All the newspapers would be trumpet-tongued with the story. It was only another bitter ordeal to bear—one of many, Loris thought, he would have to go through.

There was an intense quiet pleasure expressed by all; but no one uttered a word of congratulation; a warm hand-clasp, the look that spoke as much as words, but unlike words, could not wound—that was all.

It would have been mockery indeed to congratulate Loris McLeod on the restoration of all he had lost, when all was bought with a brother's dishonour.

In those days of silent anguish Colonel McLeod scarcely knew whether the cost was not too dear wherewith honour had been given back. He could have borne, he thought, with a dull aching at his heart, to live on in shadow, having in some sort redeemed his name in this brief campaign.

Now all that he had suffered—perhaps erred to guard so closely—was bruited about. The old name was tarnished; the spots were not rubbed off the shield. Yet now he had all for which, when he lacked it, he had passionately yearned and prayed. Honour, love, the reward for such dauntless bravery as he had shown, were his; and they fell at his feet, and he looked at them with eyes dim with pain. They seemed so burdened that he said bitterly they had come "too late."

He blamed himself for being unthankful, making little allowance for the utter depression which followed so great a mental strain. He had one passionate longing—to see Cecil, to feel the touch of her tender hands, to hear the low sympathetic voice, and to know this love was untinged with one single thought of bitterness.

Archie McLeod was buried at Ulundi with others who had fallen as he had.

So it was all for the best. There could be only a feeling of unfitness in the publicity inseparable from such a funeral as his must be if brought home to Castle McLeod

* * * * *

The newspapers published the official letter which the Commander-in-Chief forwarded to Colonel McLeod. The letter expressed the greatest satisfaction that the stigma under which so brave an officer had lived, and for which he had wrongly suffered, had been at length removed. It touched lightly on the noble generosity which had elected to bear the penalty of a brother's guilt, and warmly eulogised the services rendered to the country by Colonel McLeod.

The papers also published the fact that Colonel McLeod went down to Ridinghurst the day after an interview with the Commander-in-Chief, that he received from his regiment, the inhabitants of Hyde, and his tenantry a perfect "ovation," and that in the course of a day or two he was to be summoned to Scotland, where the Queen herself would place on his breast the Victoria Cross.

* * * * *

The old library at Ridinghurst yet once more; and Cecil McLeod, the wife of two months, is standing in the red glow of the firelight as she stood one short year before, when Colonel McLeod in measured tones told her how her hand was sought in marriage.

Now her husband's arm is round her, and she leans against his breast. He has but just come in.

It has been a field-day, and the fire-light gleams on his handsome uniform, on the medal on his breast, and—on the Victoria Cross. Old Colin lies blinking in the heat, looking up with great contentment at the two he loves best; and Loris McLeod is saying, with a smile that is very bright, tinged with that melancholy sweetness which gives half its charm to the noble face—

"I am recalling, Cecil, one day, more than two years ago, when I sat alone in this library and read that you were coming to my home. It seemed scarcely home then; and I remember wondering how I should adapt myself to new habits of life and thought, and how I should try and make you happy. It seems like a dream."

"But it is no dream that you have made me happy—so happy, my husband," answered Cecil, looking up, her white hand almost unconsciously straying to the symbol on his breast. And he bends down and kisses the pure brow uplifted to him.

A. D.

There has been some surprise that nothing was left in her will by George Eliot to her husband, Mr. Cross, but that all the money went to the family of her first husband. This was however an arrangement entered into previous to her second marriage, by the express desire of Mr. Cross who is himself very well off.

SLEIGHING is fast disappearing, and their are many indications that spring is approaching, and we would give our fellow citizens a word of warning. nothing contributes so much to the propagation of disease as dirty yards and closets. Now is the time to clean up, and we can assure those who neglect doing so, that they will suffer for it before the summer is over. We have no faith in the fearful visitations, fortold by a certain professor, of cholera black death &c, but we do believe there will be considerable atmospheric disturbance, and consequently more or less sickness resulting therefrom; therefore it becomes absolutely necessary that we take every precution in not having anything round our premises that will have a tendency to feed disease. Scarlet fever, Typhoid and Diphtheria are making their appearance in various parts of the province, and we certainly will not escape a visit from them unless our warning is attended to.

WE recieved an anomymous communication from Williamsford relative to some unpleasantness that took place in the church there on Sabbath last. In the first place we have repeatedly stated that we would pay no attention to any communication that had not the Bona-fide name of the wirter, as a guarantee of good faith, for should we do otherwise we would be flooded with endless communications from any and all who suffered some wrong, real or imaginary, and thereby continually get ourselves into hot water. In the next place, we consider, even admitting the statement sent us is correct, that the agrieved party was as much to blame as the Minister. A church is supposed to be the house of God, dedicated to his worship, although one may not agree, with the form used in any particular church, he should be willing to conform to its rules while attending when politely requested to do so, or else keep away.

EUGENIA.

From a Correspondent.

The annual tea meting in connection with the Union Sabbath School, was held in the Orange Hall, Eugenia, on Friday evening, the 16th inst. The programme, as usual, consisted of Dialogues, recitations, Vocal and Instrumental music. Speeches, were delivered by a number of local celeberites. The Superintendent of Salem Sabbath School adressed the children in a few select and well chosen. Scriptural promises, followed by the Rev. Mr. Madden the resident C. M. Minister, who gave an excellent and instructive adress. The receipts at the Door amounted to nearly $23. This speaks in itseelf the interest taken in the Sabbath School work in Eugenia. We beleive this is the largest sum taken during the whole season, out of the many entertainments which have been given. It may be asked, how is so much interest taken in the Sabbath School; simply because it is conducted on purely union principals, and any attempts to introduce Sectarian Schools have had very sudden deaths. Now that relegions instruction is nearly Tabooed in our common Schools, let us support our Sabbath School.

Now is the season when you may expect to be asked, how much sugar have you made? Sugar Bush, work is now the order of the day.

Is it any use to tell you that we expect to have spring.

Quite a number of cattle are dying, and no one seems to know the nature of the ailment.

CURE FOR DIPHTHERIA.

A correspondent of a Victoria paper writes;—Should you or any of your family be attacked with diphtheria, do not be alarmed, as it is easily and speedily cured with a doctor. When it was raging in England, a few years ago, I accompanied Dr. Field on his rounds to witness the so-called "wonderful cures' he performed, while the patients of others were dropping on all sides. The remedy, to be so rapid, must be simple. All he took with him was powder of sulphur and a quill, and with these he cured every patient without exception. He put a teaspoonful of flour of brimstone into a wine glass of water, and stirred it with his finger, instead of a spoon, as the sulphur does not readily amalgamate with water. When the sulphur was well mixed he gave it as a gargle, and in ten minutes the patient was out of danger. Brimstone kills every species of fungus in man, beast, and plant in a few minutes. Instead of spitting out the gargle, he recommended the swallowing of it. In extreme case, in which he had been called just in the nick of time, when the fungus was too nearly closed to allow the gargling, he blew the sulphur through a quill into the throat, and after the fugune had shrunk to allow it, then the gargling. He never lost a patient from diphtheria. If a patient cannot gargle, take a live coal, put it on a shovel, and sprinkle a spoonful or two of flour of brimstone at a time upon it; let the sufferer inhale it, holding the head over it, and the fungus will die. If plentyfully used, the whole room may be filled almost to suffocation; the patient can walk about in it, inhaling the fumes, with doors and windows shut. This mode of fumigating a room with sulphur has often cured most violent attacks of cold in the head, chest, &c., at any time, and is recommended in cases of consumption and asthma.

MORMONISM IN HOPEVILLE.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

SIR,—I think it not out of place to let the outside world (away from Hopeville) know of the intense excitement that is now prevailing in the quiet village of Hopeville. About one year ago a Mormon, or "latter-day saint" Elder, by the name of McIntosh, made his appearance in the vicinity of Hopeville, where, by a series of meetings, he procured some converts, and on Monday last the same person appeared according to notice publicly made, in Scarlett's Hall in this village, and is still carryon a series of meetings, with the prospect of drawing more members to his church. All parties that hear him, speak of his great ability as a speaker, and some are talking of trying to procure him as the next candidate for the Proton Reeveship; for his able tongue and cleverness in quoting the scriptures, causes all who attack him to be put hors de combat. On Monday night the meeting was rather noisey, but Tuesday night there was a full house and good order. He was taken to task by a Mr. Bush a Millerite who hailed from London, Ont., but after some sharp firing and some unpleasant and unseemly expressions, Mr. Bush was fairly "Bushed," and had to secumb to the Latter-day Saint; but by the able arguments of the Latter-day saint and the Millerite, there appeared a poor chance for the poor plain Episcopalian, Presbyterian, or Methodist. Wednesday night the house was thinner, not so many of the respectable community attended; but a few young men and boys from the the west side of Proton, well known for their quarling propencity put in an appearance. They followed their usual custom when they all come together and made it very unpleasant for the Saint. What shall follow we shall see. Yours,

AN OBSERVER.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

DEAR SIR,—The diphtheria is still lurking in this section of country, and we have no guarantee that the Village of Flesherton may not be attacked this spring. Now do you not think, Mr. Editor, that it would be well to have a board of health organised to examine the back yards, and in case of any nuisance being found to have them removed. It may save Rachel much weeping for her children the ensuing summer.

Yours &c,
VILLAGER.

To the [illegible]

Come all [illegible] a song,
It is short, [illegible]
[illegible] you long;
'Tis a list of the sorrows that [illegible]
A young man while keeping a Bachelor's Hall.

CHORUS.

Oh! Bachelor's Hall,
Oh! Bachelor's Hall,
Woe's me for the sorrows
Of Bachelor's Hall.

The first week I managed exceedingly well,
And swore 'twas elysium thus lonely to dwell;
But things got untidy—my patience grew small,
And I vowed it a bore keeping Bachelor's Hall.—Cho.

One night I returned from my travels with glee,
Expecting a cup of most excellent tea;
But found that my sugar, young hyson and all,
Had banished like winkie, from Bachelor's Hall.—Cho.

I was asked to a party, and promised to go
And went to rig up for business, when lo!
Shirts, dickies and collars, white stockings and all,
Were black as the stove-pipe of Bachelor's Hall.—Cho.

A friend dropped upon me at dinner one day,
And coolly informed a fortnight he'd stay;
I smiled and said welcome, but oh! it was gall,
To be pestored with strangers at Bachelor's Hall.—Cho.

[T]hings all went to wreck—I cannot tell how,
At last I was forced neath misfortune to bow;
And married a widow, fair, forty, and tall,
And so bade adieu to old Bachelor's Hall.—Cho.

My song it is ended, and so is my sorrow,
No more I'm distracted with care for to-morrow;
My plump, buxom widow, she manages all,
Which is heav'n when compared with Bachelor's Hall.

Oh! Bachelor's Hall,
Oh! Bachelor's Hall,
Young gents be aware
Of Bachelor's Hall.

HAGYARD'S PECTORAL BALSOM is composed of the most healing balsams and gums. The Balsam, which enters its composition, were used by the natives when America was first discovered, and are combined with other vegetable tonics, so blended together, that it is a specific for all affections of the throat and lungs. Thousands of bottles are used annually, and it is considered one of the standard preparations of the day.

TO ADVERTISERS.—We purpose to greatly improve "The Standard" the first week in April, when we will issue 300 extra copies for free distribution. Send in your advertisements in good time.

THE Minutes of Artemesia were received last week, but were crowded out. We have made arrangments, that will enable us to insert communications that reach us before noon on Wednesday in each week, after this, and we think it will prove more satisfactory to our patrons,

TALK is cheap, but it takes money to buy goods. W. J. McFarland is the wrost abused man in Markdale. Solid chunks of hard names are heaped upon him daily by those High-priced One-idea, Old Fogy, Good natured, dry goods and groceries dealers who cannot keep pace with his energy; his business tact; and his stock and prices, and his square dealing. They know McFarland does the largest business North of Toronto, and they are mad.

SUDDEN DEATH.—On Wednesday last a farmer living in the vicinity of Hepworth, named John Harrison, drank a very large quantity of malt whisky at Plow's Hotel, which had the effect of causing his death on Thursday morning. An inquest was held by Coroner Cameron, and the medical examination disclosed the fact that death was caused by alcoholic poisoning, and a verdict to that effect was rendered by the jury. The deceased was a man generally respected in the neighborhood, and was not usually addicted to the use of spirits, but once or twice a year he would indulge too freely, and he has now fallen a victim to the fell destroyer. He leaves a wife and ten children to mourn his untimely end.

THE social at Dufferin Hall on Tuesday evening was a decided success. After a couple of hours of social enjoyment, the Eatables were disposed of in a manner which spoke highly of their good quality. The programme was opened by the Markdale string Band, who performed many pieces during the evening. Their performances, were excellent and were highly appreciated. A company of ladies and gentlemen from Maxwell gave many pieces, among which were several of the Hawkin's Troupe favorits. Their singing contributed in no small measure to the pleasure of the evening, and hope they will come again to Markdale. Readings were given by Willie Davis, Messers Ferguson, and J. W. H. Milne, of Maxwell, and a recitation by W. L. B. Hamlin. The programme, on the whole, was rendered in a very creditable manner and did no discredit to all concerned. We hope to enjoy many such evenings. The proceeds amounted to $13.

You will find everything that I sell just as I represent it, and as good value as you can possibly get for your money anywhere, as I have always held that honorable dealing is the only true course for a business man.

WOMAN GOSSIP.

Fashion Notes.

Long overskirts will be in vogue this spring.

Only one variety of flowers is used in the same hat.

The style called "albums" is quaint and very striking.

High hair-dressing, in the style of Louis XV., is now la mode.

Bonnet crowns of black net are wrought with cut-steel beads.

Plastrons of very rich material are seen on the new basques.

Piano-backs give a wide scope for peacocks' feather application.

Lace spun of straw will be a novelty on new spring and summer hats.

Flowers and feathers will be about equally used upon spring bonnets.

Twilled Scotch ginghams, such as Lady Macbeth wore still hold their own.

Most of the new dresses for school-girls are double-breasted, and have large buttons.

Cretonnes, for shirtings and dresses, show designs of butterflies, dragon-flies and horse-shoes.

To make a belt bow requires a yard and five-eighths of eight-inch ribbon—no more, no less.

A very handsome finish to sheer white dresses is to have the white muslin edged with black lace.

Cream, mauve, pale pink, and moonlight blue combine exquisitely with the fashionable silver lace.

In evening dresses loops or scarves of silk or soft satin surah can be twisted with the drapery at the back.

Some of the new patterns of cotton goods, both for indoor and outdoor costumes, have the appearance of embroidery.

Very handsome are the fronts of white or colored silks, quilted and let into dresses and covered with a lattice-work of pearls.

A number of the new figures on spring cambric are exact copies of wedge-shaped cuneiform figures seen on Assyrian antiquities.

The rich lace collars and cuffs which some mammas add to their little boys' velvet suits are not half so elegant as plain white linen.

Blue tarlatan with a decoration of lilies makes a pretty dress for some young girls, but the color does not suit all complexions by any means.

Those who have laid away their plain silks in lavender will be rejoiced to hear that there are prognostications of a revival of that style of dress.

Poke bonnets ought only to be worn by those whose faces are so beautiful that even this ugly style cannot mar the effect of their lovely lips and brilliant eyes.

Lace muffs, covered with small, spring flowers, are dressy additions to simple, dark dresses, and, together with lace and flower headdress or frillsome, are used for concerts and the opera.

Jabots of creamy lace with a bunch of strawberries, leaves, and flowers, with a hanging cluster of fruit, or with a small bunch of mandarin oranges and leaves, are worn at the side of the belt.

Pale lemon-color and brown, pale and dark royal purple, amethyst and deep violet, seal-brown and gold, pale coral and deepest crimson, cream and maroon, myrtle and sea-green, also cinnamon and yellow pottery shades, are all good combinations.

One of the best models for a cotton dress expresses the Jersey design, with a low-cornered throat and embellished with a handsome muslin fichu; the "monk" style of sleeve and apron overskirt, with the wrinkled model, and deeply pointed on the left side.

A coat bodice of plain black or embossed velvet is most desirable at this time in the year, as it may be worn late into the spring with various skirts. Such a corsage does not really require trimming, but a rich chenille fringe tipped with jet added round the neck and across the front renders it more dressy.

Chemisettes are very useful not only to improve a worn dress, but serve to vary perfect toilets. One style is cut out of soft muslin or net to fit the neck and throat. It is then covered with lace, a full ruche is added round the throat and it is put on under the bodice with the fronts and round the neck and secured in the center by pins to the under body before the dress is fastened.

Waifs.

The sealskin sacque is "dear and yet so far."

Mrs. Livermore is lecturing on "How Shall we Reach the Boys?" Let her ask the girls.

Bartlett-Coutts loves to lounge and smoke a cigar while his dovey sits at the piano and warbles "Will you love me, darling, when I mould?"

The Baroness Coutts' marriage was romantic and the papers will get along all right until the young husband makes a mistake and calls her grandma.

The Syracuse Standard asks: "Will some one tell us what Mrs. Langtry's maiden name was?" Certainly. Her maiden aim was to marry Mr. Langtry.

Young lady, examining some bridal veils —"Can you really recommend this one?" Over zealous shopman—"Oh, yes, miss! It has been used several times."

The English papers are amazed at the details of Senator Sharon's house and its ground-plan, published in the report of his daughter's wedding, considering the same of much value to house-breakers.

A Boston doctor advertises for a wife who, among other qualifications, must have brains than the advertiser. Should think he would have great difficulty in finding such a woman.

They met, they smiled, they wept, they loved.
He called her Jane, she called him Thomas—
A richer man rode down the lane,
And Tom brought suit for breach of promise.

After The Party. — Elderly Coquette: "And I'm sure you naughty girls sat up ever so late talking us over! How I should like to have hid myself behind a screen and heard it all!" Horrid boy—"No, you wouldn't!"

"Dance," said the young lieutenant, "by Jehosophat, I'll become the best dancer in Washington! Hang it, I don't want to go out west and fight Indians, and if I become the favorite dancer do you suppose the daughters of the senators will let their pa permit me to be sent away? I know what's what."

"I declare I'll never go to another matinee as long as I live," said young Mrs. Guffey the other day, throwing herself into a chair and fanning herself indignantly. "Wasn't the play good?" asked Guffey. "Oh, good enough, I suppose; but that ill-bred, great stuck-up Mrs. Diffendorfer sat before me with such a lovely bonnet on that I couldn't hear a word."

Mr. Ashmead Bartlett Burdett-Coutts and his wife are expected soon to make a visit and an extended tour in this country. Mr. Bartlett is said to be a remarkably fine-looking man, with a fresh complexion, and many proportions to his six feet of stature, and the lady is a very well preserved English woman.

Queen Margherita's bedroom is furnished in pale blue satin; the mattresses are of white brocade; the bedstead is of dark wood, and over the head hang an ivory crucifix and a little oil-painting framed in gold; easy-chairs are by the fire-place, above which is a picture of the little Prince of Naples. Adjoining this is the Queen's study, hung with ceil-an-lait satin, and beyond are the dressing-rooms, lined with mirrors, and decorated with rare china.

A New Fashion.

The latest fashionable Parisian whim adopted here, and a very pretty one, is the sending of bouquets and baskets of flowers to a newly-engaged young lady by her various gentlemen friends, to express their congratulations. A basket sent the other day to a young Boston lady, whose engagement is announced, was composed of Jacqueminot and Marshal Neil roses, violets and lilies of the valley; it was in a standing basket, and on each side was an immense bow of pink satin ribbon, two fingers wide, with long ends reaching to the floor. In the knot of each bow was tucked a bunch of violets.

Bad Dressing.

Heavily-ornamented skirts, says the London Truth, fatigue the hips and dorsal region, and induce a languid and drawn-down appearance of face. They also affect the digestion. Tight-lacing spoils the complexion, and gives a red nose and congested look to the shoulders. Ideas can not flow so freely when the waist is squeezed. Therefore, therefore, the repartee in conversation, so good for one's health and all that is brought by the ... [illegible] ... ceremonious dinners and receptions. ... [illegible] ...

First Love.

Here is the danger which lies in first love. Always it is vowed to an ideal. Once in a thousand times, perhaps, the actual person is found so much to resemble the imaginary figure that the exalted sentiment may drop, and rest upon that reality without shock or change. But commonly the difference is world-wide. ... [illegible] ...

Rachel's Guitar.

The great tragedienne was not exempt from human failings. Her greatest as is well known, was her cupidity. ... [illegible] ...

Toothsome Hints.

It is natural for some people to have better teeth than others, but all must give attention to their cleansing and other treatment if they would have good teeth in old age. A moderately stiff brush should be used thoroughly at least twice a day—morning and night. Soft water (blood-warm) and pure castile, or the best of that soap—white castile, for instance—are the only requisite besides the brush. Powders are generally injurious to the enamel, and so are the much advertised liquid mixtures. Strong acids, like lemon-juice, are destructive, and the mingling of hot and cold food or drink at meals is very harmful. Candy, brown or dark, nutritious food, like well-baked Graham bread and crackers, promotes tooth growth; white soft, watery food tends to weaken the teeth. It is now the opinion of leading dentists in Europe and this country that the cause of there is so much tooth decay in early life, is the lack of phosphate in the soft materials given to children as food, which an swallowed without any chewing. On the appearance of decay a good dentist should be employed. Much toothache is due to indigestion and constitutional debility, and to other affections of the nervous system. So called "neuralgia" may be traced to decayed, carious teeth. Care in the matter of food and in the cleaning of the teeth would save a vast dea of suffering and expense.

Caricaturing the British.

(From the Pall Mall Gazette.)

In the streets of Lahore, according to an Anglo-Indian contemporary, the popular amusement of late has been a satirical representation of the Afghan war. A performing monkey is ordered by his master to show the British marched into Afghanistan. The monkey came jumping along, dressed in a coat for the occasion in all the bravery of redcoat, yellow trousers, plumed hat, and a great gun. He strutted about to a lively accompaniment on the tom-tom, and ever and anon would make a feint with his gun at an imaginary foe. After a little time, the monkey appeared minus of false moustaches, and soon they had to be given up. Then at last the command was given to show how the British came back from Kabul. The monkey directly went down on his hands and legs, snatching up a dirty old rag, came forward clutching his stick and limping on three legs. Covering his face with a cap, amid the shouts and roars of laughter which greeted this surprise. This hoop-the-trick of travelling Afghanistan was recommended that the Indian government in the laughter of the Native drifted in advance by the late Government. The laughter of the Native public must be mitigated the prestige which we have gained by that maddened enterprise.

Can't Stop Laughing.

THE STRANGE MALADY WHICH AFFLICTS A NEW JERSEY FAMILY.

(Frenchtown, N. J., Cor. Philadelphia Times.)

Straight across the Delaware from here, and back among the hills which run parallel with the river for many miles, lives a family concerning whom the strangest stories are told. The father and son are farmers, and all live in a large, substantial house a few rods from the road to Doylestown. They are all chronic laughers, having an affliction of the muscles of the face and throat which compels them to give vent to apparent merriment at stated intervals. The malady first appeared in the father about ten years ago. He was usually a very quiet man, enjoying fun, but manifesting his enjoyment without much noise. He was seated at the dinner table one day in the spring of the year, eating steadily, and not engaging in any of the conversation which the other members of the family were carrying on. Suddenly, without any cause, he burst into a loud fit of laughter, so extremely different from his accustomed laugh that all were attracted by it at once. When asked what was the reason for his sudden outburst he made no reply, but continued his merriment. Some of the boys thought he had hysterics and pounded him on the back, but it did no good. After a few moments he made motions for pencil and paper, and wrote that he was unable to control his risibles, and asked them to sent for a doctor.

The rural physician came, but could give no remedy that stopped the laughter. Peal after peal of what sounded like the heartiest kind of fun came from him, and nothing could avail to prevent it. The doctor finally came to the conclusion that he was the victim of a nervous attack, and, leaving a nervine, departed. The father continued laughing until about sundown, when he suddenly stopped and fell on the floor completely prostrated. He soon grew better, however, ate a hearty supper and spent the evening much as usual. No signs of a return of the old trouble appearing, he went to bed and was soon fast asleep. Along about 2 o'clock in the morning, however, his wife was awakened by his laughter, and the same symptoms manifested themselves as on the afternoon previous. He kept it up until 7 o'clock, laughing loud and strong. At 7 o'clock the noise suddenly ceased and did not occur again until dinner time. Thus it continued, recurring each day shortly after noon, and in the night about 2 o'clock, and has ever since. As the week passed he grew so accustomed to the disease that he was caused very little inconvenience by it. He did not get tired out, as at first, and was soon able to go about his work—sowing seed and plowing corn, digging vegetables, and watering the cattle—while laughing immoderately. He could not talk while under one of the spells, but carried a slate and pencil around with him, after the fashion of a deaf and dumb person.

The troubles was very regular in its coming and going, and only occasionally broke forth at unlooked-for seasons. Once the old man was taken in church, just when the minister was exhorting his hearers in the most solemn strains, and spoiled the effect of the discourse, besides disturbing the equilibrium of the clergyman. Another time he was found by one of the neighbours lying beside the road, lying beneath a log of flour, laughing at a terrific rate. He had been taken while driving home from the mill, and the suddenness of the sounds frightened the horse, causing it to run away and dump the driver and part of his load out on the road. For eighteen months the father was the only one of the household affected with the malady. Several of them had complained from time to time of an inclination to join the father in the laugh, but none of them did so until nearly two years after he was first taken. Then Mary, the youngest child, suddenly burst into a similar fit during one of her father's attacks. From that time on she has laughed at about the same hours as her father does. One by one the remaining members fell victims to the strange complaint, until three years ago there was but one left free, and that was Charles, the oldest son. He long exemption led him to believe he would escape the contagion. But he was mistaken, and in 1878 he was taken in a first attack while petitioning for the hand of a Harrisburg damsel. So frightened was the lady by the queer behaviour of her suitor that she ran from the room, and it was long before his explanations could induce her to see him again. She is now one of the family here, and although she has been in the household ever since the malady, never minds the hideous chorus of laughter which twice a day resounds through the house. It is regarded as rather strange that none of the neighbours should have caught the infection, but such is the case, although many of them mingle constantly with the family.

Everything possible has been done to alleviate or remove the malady, but without perceptible effect. Several eminent physicians from the leading cities have visited the home and grown interested in the case. They all confess themselves baffled, and want one or two of the family to go to the city, where they can receive constant treatment. This they refuse to do. Their peculiar trouble, so noticeable and odd, has made them very sensitive, and they shrink from any scheme where they will be subjected to public scrutiny and remark. They go to church or the store in the village close by, and attend social gatherings occasionally in the neighbourhood in the evenings, but only among life-long friends. People within a radius of a few miles are so accustomed to the thing that they never mind or mention it. Consequently, very few people outside of the immediate vicinity, and the physicians who have attended them, are cognizant of the circumstances.

The years of incessant laughter have told somewhat on the faces of the family, but less so than might be expected. The father's face was so very noticeable. There are scores of lines under the eyes and above the cheeks, caused by the drawing up of the skin. Then their mouths have become wider, and they drop down ... The most marked result of the disease, however, is in the voice. The father's fine bass voice ... all the same inflection and intonation. Most of them have more or less trouble with their eyes, several having become "near sighted." The pupils have contracted and the entire eyeball is diminished in size. This is accounted for by the contraction of the eyes while laughing and the effort required to see while they are under going an attack. Very little physical annoyance is caused by the laughers. They read and write, sleep and work without any trouble. The only thing they seem to be unable to do while attacked is talk, and that can readily be understood. Several grandchildren have been born to the family, but in one instance they were taken soon after birth with the malady at about the same hours as their parents. Of course they do not laugh as the older ones do, but they cry and express all the signs of joy which characterize the others. They have been ... a day, and never cry while in that state.

Ischia.

The island of Ischia which has come into such sudden and mournful prominence lately from the terrible disaster that has fallen on it, is the ancient Aenaria or Inarime, fabled in mythological story as the country beneath which the monster Typhoeus was concealed. In the eastern corner of Campania, between the Bay of Naples and that of Gaeta. It is in Homer who tells us that the Latin poets converted into Inarime of which was lashed by Jupiter with flashes of lightning. This horrible monster, in the ... of course, the gentle expression of the ancient world, fabled to itself one of the gigantic forces of nature, was the god of Tartarus, and the Earth. Accounts differ, however, as to his genealogy, and some seem to give Juno the honour of having been his mother. He was a most terrible and ferocious prodigy, not by very prepossessing in appearance, nor is some of those who generally of modern would in any way feel proud. He had no less than a hundred heads, and all with his fearful ... while uttered the most terrible voices, there was no one, that made every dreadful sound ... with him. He rebelled against the Gods, and was at length subdued by Jupiter with a flash of lightning, and buried in Tartarus, under Mount Ætna. In which account ancient Aenaria. The modern Ischia has about twenty-five or thirty thousand inhabitants and is ... The soil is extremely fertile ... medicinal waters, for the excellence of its climate ... it is about twenty-four square miles in circumference ... and contains several villages and hamlets. It suffered greatly from an earthquake in 1828, and there was some slight shock in 1867 ...

RELIGIOUS MATTERS.

In Scotland during the last five years more new Baptist chapels have been built and more debts cleared off than in the previous 40 years.

The report of the Pan-Presbyterian Council just issued gives the number of this denomination in the world about 3,000,000 of communicants.

Mrs. Valeria Stone, of Malden, Mass., gave, the last year, to educational institutions of the Congregational denomination, no less than $1,000,753.

Dean Church's memorial asking for toleration for Ritualism in the Church of England has received the signatures of no fewer than 3,538 clergymen.

Madagascar has 70,125 church members, nearly seven-ninths as many as the Congregational churches of Massachusetts. The London Missionary Society has 30 agents there, but nearly all the Pastors are natives.

The Rev. Lord John Thynne, D. D., sub-Dean of Westminster Abbey, is dead. He became Canon at Westminster in 1831, and was 82 years old. He assisted at two coronations—those of William IV. and Queen Victoria.

An anti-vivisection prayer-meeting was held recently in Edinburgh, but a number of medical students made such a noise that the meeting was closed sooner than was expected. There were singing, praying, and a short address.

It appears that Parker Memorial Hall, Boston, is to remain in the hands of the Twenty-eighth Society after all. The purchaser has intimated that he cannot complete his agreement. A Spiritualist has advanced $25,000 toward paying off the mortgage. Through his generosity the society retains possession of the hall.

Mr. Robert Arthington, of Leeds, has lately offered the Church Missionary Society the sum of £5,000 for investment toward providing a fund for the maintenance of a steamer and a staff of agents on the Upper Binue and Lake Chad. Grave fears are entertained for the safety of the society's agents on the Victoria Nyanza.

The Prime Minister and Mrs. Gladstone have each contributed the sum of 10 guineas to the fund for a memorial to the late Mr. Lowder, who was for some years Rector of St. Peter's, London Docks. It is desired to raise £10,000, toward which £3,000 has been subscribed, for parochial institutions and the building of a clergy-house.

An English Church paper learns that it has been resolved to issue a royal commission to inquire into the whole question of ecclesiastical judicature in England since the act of the submission of the clergy, with a view of recommending such changes as may relieve the present strain, largely due to the anomalous character of the courts claiming to be spiritual, as well as to their singular findings.

Some time ago the wife of the Governor-General of the Province of Chili, China, fell sick, and Miss Howard, an American missionary physician, as a last resort, was called to attend her. She was cured, and the Viceroy, Li Hung Chang, full of gratitude, opened a public dispensary, and placed Miss Howard and Dr. McKenzie in charge of it with no restrictions. This movement, which is epochal in China, has developed into a hospital which has just been opened in a fine building in the native style, costing $6,000. The wealthy Chinese contributed freely. The ceremonies of the opening of the hospital were graced by the presence of the Viceroy and several nobles.

Glass Eyes.

A reporter of the Chicago Inter Ocean has been investigating the trade in glass eyes. From the leading dealer in the West, a firm which has sold glass eyes for many years, he learned that they sell annually as a thousand wearers of them in that city, and that from 600 to 800 eyes are sold there every year. The best eyes are made at Uri in Germany, the manufacture centering at that place on account of the convenience there of fine silicates and other minerals needed in the business. The German eyes withstand the corrosive effects of tears and other secretions better than those made in France.

At Uri, are made also vast quantities of eyes used by taxidermists in mounting birds, animals, and other natural history specimens, besides a superior quality of glass marbles for children's games.

The artificial eye is a delicate shell or case, very light and thin, and concave so as to fit over what is left of the eyeball. The shell is cut from a hollow ball or bubble of glass, the iris is blown in, and then the whole is delicately recoated.

The trade in Chicago has undergone a curious change. Twenty years ago there were many more sales of dark eyes than light, but from that period on the sale of dark eyes has been perceptibly dying out. Now nearly all are light eyes, say twenty light to one dark. In Boston the per centage is even larger, about thirty-five blue or light eyes to one brown; while on the other hand, in New Orleans fifty brown or dark eyes are sold to one blue. Regarding the change of colouring Chicago of course fashion has nothing to do with it. No one has yet been able to explain it. The statistics shall be that the change simply shows that the influx of population has been from the East principally and from northern Europe.

Surgical operations are performed much more skillfully than formerly. Time was when it was deemed necessary to take out the eye so that the artificial eye became a fixed, glassy, staring object. Now amputation of portions of the eye can be performed in such a way that the artificial glass eye fitted on the stump, which moves quite naturally.

Sometimes those who have lost an eye will have two or three artificial substitutes. They will use one for the day-light with a small pupil, and another for night time with a large pupil to offset the dilatation.

MISCELLANEOUS.

How publicly and in a way of course that the matter is carried on by the Dutch Boers in South Africa, Lord Kimberley recently showed in Parliament by a quotation from a letter written by the wife of a Boer, in which she states that a "Boer had come home with six head of cattle and one Kaffir girl, and that another came home with thirty-two Kaffir girls, whom he wanted to sell for half a sovereign a piece."

Ischia, the scene of the frightful earthquake in which probably 200 lives have been lost, is a remarkably fertile island at the northern entrance of the bay of Naples, much resorted to by travellers for its famous warm baths. Near its centre is a volcano, which, though it has not been in eruption for centuries, is still active, and there are a dozen smaller volcanoes on the islet, which contains only twenty-six square miles, and a population of about 25,000. Its present fate revivifies the historic reputation of the Venetian region as one where nature brings side by side her beauties and terrors.

THE "resonator" is the name given by Signor Beck to an invention for increasing the volume and power of the human voice when singing. This appliance is based on the principle given by the hard portion of the palate, which acts as a kind of sounding board when the mouth is open for singing, and it is for the purpose of increasing the efficiency of the palate in this respect that the resonator has been designed. It consists of a gold plate fitted to the upper part of the mouth, as the gold plate of a set of artificial teeth—the plate being attached to the natural upper teeth—much in the same way as the gold plate of a set of artificial teeth—the gold plate being curved at the front both directions, convex downward in both directions. A hollow sounding board, as it may be termed, is thus formed, and is said to have a remarkable effect on the volume of sound produced by the person wearing the instrument. It is also claimed that the apparatus has no prejudicial effect upon the distinctness of articulation, and that it can be worn without the slightest inconvenience after moderate practice.

OUR YOUNG FOLKS.

Cousin Charley's Story.

(Concluded.)

"Well, never mind what it was, but the wolf got something for his dinner. He had enough for himself, and then he went back to the cave, and waited and waited. 'Here he is,'" said Walter, propping the wolf against the side of the cave. "He's so hungry he can't stand up. And now back comes the fox, over the hill here, and he has n't a single thing. 'You've been long enough,' said the wolf; 'you must have had bad luck.' 'Luck!' said the fox; 'I had no luck at all. But I suppose you have enough for us both.' 'I have n't any more than I want for myself,' said the wolf. 'But I said I'd divide, and so I will.' And the wolf divided, but they had to get up very early next morning and go hunting again. The wolf was home first that day. It was a good day for hunting, and it seemed to him very strange the fox should come again with nothing at all. But he did. He had had bad luck again, and so the wolf divided. But he began to wish he had n't asked the fox to live with him. The next day and the next day it was just the same. The wolf had to hunt for both, and he got very tired of it. He thought about it a great deal, and the more he thought, the more it seemed to him very queer the fox had such bad luck. One day, when he was home early, he thought he would go in search of the fox, and see what he was about. There was snow on the ground, and he could follow the fox's tracks. He followed along till he came in sight of the hollow tree, and there he saw the fox. He had had good luck that day, sure enough! For, on the ground beside him, there were a fat goose and two squirrels. The wolf watched him; he was scratching and digging in the snow; by and by he had dug a big hole, and he put the goose and squirrels in and covered them up, and wherever there were spots of blood on the snow, he licked them up. 'Aha!' said the wolf to himself. 'I know you now, Mister Fox! Fine good feeding you've had between my house and your cupboard! The sooner we part the better.' But the wolf did n't say a word to the fox, because he did n't want to quarrel with him. He was afraid of such a clever partner; but he made up his mind he would n't feed him any longer. He went home to the cave and ate all he wanted for his own dinner, and what was left he hid away. When the fox came, he found the cave empty. No wolf, no dinner. Nothing but the beds of leaves. The fox waited a long while, and when the wolf did n't come, he went back to the hollow tree and dug up one of the squirrels for his supper. But he went back to the wolf's house to sleep. The next morning, the wolf lay asleep in the bed, beside him. The fox spoke to him and shook him; then the wolf turned over, and said he was sick and could n't hunt that day. So the fox went away by himself. It was a bad day for hunting—very windy; and the snow blew so, he could n't see far before his face. He lay in the bushes and watched, but he could n't find a thing to eat, so he had to go back to his own hole under the hollow tree. He was scraping the snow away from the hole, when a wind blew through the bare trees—a great wind that came from a long way off. The fox heard it coming, and heard the trees creak and rattle their dry boughs. It came on, whoo-oo-oo! till it struck the hollow tree! over it went, and the fox was underneath. He lay there all night; he was n't dead, but he could n't stir; the tree held him down, and one of his legs was broken. He lay their all the next day; and his legs hurt him so, he could not help crying, and he was awfully hungry. When it was evening again, and the moon shone on the snow, he saw a shadow coming, slow—slow—across the white moonlight. It was old Master Wolf, who had come to look for his partner. He was walking softly, for he thought the fox might be at some of his tricks; but the fox was quiet enough now. 'Well,' said the wolf, 'here you are!' 'Yes here I am,' the fox said 'I hope you have n't waited dinner for me.' The wolf saw the blood on the snow. He knew it was the fox's blood and that he was hurt. 'It serves him right,' he said to himself. The fox turned his eyes up at him, for he was fastened down, and could n't move his head. 'You need n't come back to the cave,' said the wolf, 'there is n't room for two. Good-night;' and then he went back over the hill. But he walked very slowly. He kept walking slower and slower, and by and by, he stopped and listened. The fox had tried not to moan while the wolf was there, but now his pain made him cry out, and the wolf heard him, for the woods were still. 'After all,' he said, he's my partner. I chose him myself.' He thought about it a little while longer, and then he went back to the tree, 'See here, now,' he said to the fox, 'I don't owe you anything, but I don't mind doing you a good turn if you wont expect anything more from me.' 'I don't expect anything,' the fox said. 'I never have. I have n't asked you to help me, have I?' 'No, you have n't, but I will.' He worked away at the tree, digging and gnawing, until he got the fox loose, and he crawled out and limped away over the snow. 'Better take along what you've got in your hole!' the wolf called after him. 'Thank you! I'll leave that for you,' said the fox. 'I owe you more than that.' The wolf did n't take it, though he was hungry. Somehow it seemed to him it would n't taste good. But the fox came back that night, and dug up the old goose and carried it away. The wolf never saw him again.',

Now there was silence in the room, and Mamma, listening for Robbie's voice and not hearing it, rose and went softly to the bed. Robbie was fast asleep, and Walter lay on his back, making funny shadows on the wall with the wolf and the fox.

"Was n't that a nice story, Aunt Helen?"

"Yes; but do you think Robbie understood it, Walter?"

"But he liked it," Walter said. "He likes things he can't quite understand."

When Robbie awoke, Walter was standing by him, all dressed, and the sun was shining into the room.

"Where is the wolf and the fox?" he said, sitting up in bed.

There lay the old Noah's ark and the "froggy" book, but the wood and the cave and the hollow tree were gone.

Customer—"These cigars I bought here yesterday were mighty bad." Dealer—"Bad? Why, sir, I've sold thousands and thousands of those cigars, and you're the first one to find fault with them." Customer—"I don't know anything about that, but I know that when I tried to smoke——" Dealer—"Ah, I see, I see! That's were you made a mistake. I supposed that you wanted them to treat your friends with. I thought there must be some mistake about it."

University Thought.

(From the Toronto Truth.)

The intellectual life of any nation is generally understood to centre in its Universities, and to find there its fullest development and most complete expression. This expectation, it will be readily admitted, is a perfectly natural and just one, and in most cases at any rate, if not universally, the facts of the case will prove that it is well founded. Everything that training and assistance can do to fit a man for the work of life is there done. There, if anywhere, he has opportunities to plant the seeds of what in after years may develope into perfect and full-rounded character. It is thither that the best intellects among the youth of a country naturally gravitate, whether urged by love of culture and learning for their own sakes, or by more vulgar ambition. Naturally, therefore, every tendency of thought and feeling that manifests itself in such a place, is a matter of no small interest and importance, and will be watched with greater or less anxiety. It is a matter for public concern, and one in which the public generally is bound to be interested, for a country educates its youth, not more for their good than for its own interests. We have had the privilege lately of seeing a paper which is said to be a typical exponent of University College thought. If this be really the case we are sorry for it. But we can hardly believe that such is the case. It would be a melancholy thing, and cause for deep humiliation, if the minds on which our country is supposed to have most reason to congratulate itself, were content to be represented by any such organ as the 'Varsity has shown itself to be. The name alone is almost a condemnation. A string of utterances, supposed to be apophthegms, and meant to be witty, instructive and amusing, are given with all the assurance of a Delphic oracle, or a Bacon at the very least; a laboured article on some metaphysical or moral subject, in which the writer makes nothing clear but that he is wholly beyond his depth, some bad spelling as an example of a species of humour which is so common now-a-days as to be rarely appreciated, these are marked features of this wonderful production. Its tone it would appear is "liberal." Its liberality takes a form that is not uncommon in these days. It makes admirable confusion between sound and sense, displays an incredible amount of youthful insolence and self-assurance, which it mistakes for the righteous anger and contempt of superior wisdom; it confounds what is very like shallow and presumptuous blasphemy with profound and farseeing insight into all things that have been, are now, or ever shall be; it patronizes its elders, and is altogether very peculiar and praiseworthy. We are glad to think that Mr. Lorimer has not done badly on the whole, in his "Institutes of Law," and though unfortunately, his views and those of the 'Varsity do not coincide on many important points, that of course is a mere matter of time. If the 'Varsity had the circulation it so richly deserves, all the false views by which that gentleman has injured the race, would be speedily condemned. These things the editors of the 'Varsity would be greatly the better of—a few more years, a little more modesty, a little less conceit and confidence in their own acquirements, a little more reverence, and not a little more common sense.

MATTERS DRAMATIC.

Bernhardt has agreed to prolong her stay in this country. There is naturally more length than breadth in her stays.

A gentleman who happened to be in Rome a few years ago, when Sothern was there, went out one day to the Pincian Hill to witness the sunset. "The afternoon, a fine one, had brought out the Nabobs in carriages, and the bobs on foot. As the orb sank, and the band ceased to play, a hand fell lightly on my shoulder, and a voice said, 'Ring down; the red fire's out.' It was the voice of Dundreary on the hill of Lucullus."

THE elder Coquelin, whom Edwin Booth regards as the greatest French artist he has seen, is far more Irish than French in appearance, and is the image of Oliver Goldsmith. The well-set observant, comic eye, the nose, the full cheeks, and the bocca ridente of the actor resemble closely those of the Irish poet, dramatist, and novelist. Coquelin would be just as poor as Goldsmith, if his wife did not take his money from him to invest. He lets her draw every centime that he earns. At home he is one of the most amiable of human beings.

ADELINA PATTI spends her money freely, and drives hard bargains with managers. But she is charitable, and helps many a broken-down artist with a quiet munificence of which the world never hears. Her kitchen costs her comparative little her tastes in this direction being simple. When she is going to sing, Patti dines about 4, the meal being an extremely light one. A long nap follows, and she is fresh for the evening's work. Her refection in the intervals of singing is of various kinds, now a raw egg, now a glass of lemonade, She has even been known to take a cup of tea. After the play she is often the life of a supper party. Though lacking the gift of wit, she enjoys it keenly in others, and has a lively sense of humor. The secret of her charm lies in her animal spirits. She is gay, and makes others gay.

MINNIE PALMER is the star of a dramatic company now travelling in the West. Sadie Bigelow was until lately a member of the same organization. Both are pretty, talented, and popular. The cause of Miss Bigelow's withdrawal is given by her as follows: "One night we were playing poker, Miss Palmer and myself, when I bet five cents, that she wanted to 'see' my hand. She said she had only a penny left, and I told her that if she wanted to 'call' me she must borrow four more. Thereupon she said I was a real mean thing, and we had a few words. Once after that she came into the room where I was playing, and said she would not join in the game if I continued in it. This I regarded as an insult, and I threw up my hand at once." Efforts at reconciliation were so far successful that the actresses kissed each other, but the quarrel broke out afresh, and Miss Bigelow, collecting her salary by the help of a Sheriff, resigned.

MR. BOOTH'S success as Lear, says the London World, has been almost unqualified. The performance is remarkable for its elaboration, refinement, and subtlety; for its force, passion, and tenderness. But Mr. Booth's voice has suffered, either from the influence of the weather or from the stress of his nightly exertions; the symptoms of over-fatigue are too evident; his grand tones do not always come when he calls for them, his declamation has lost its resonance, and his special gifts as an elocutionist prove to him of much less avail than usual. Mr. Booth has thus been unable to render full justice to himself and his intentions. He has powerfully affected his audience, however, by the picturesqueness, the artistic symmetry and consistency, the absolute abandonment of his representation of the character. Few actors can have rendered at once so forcibly, and yet with such minute finish—due regard being had, of course, to the requirements of histrionic effect—the physical and mental infirmities of Lear, his senile peevishness and peremptoriness, his ungovernable wrath, his vengeful frenzy, his terrible despair and most pathetic death.

The Great Western Railway.

It is assuredly no insignificant token of returning prosperity that this road has at length been able to declare a dividend of three per cent. on its ordinary stock. This will be a source of gratification to everyone. Constructed as that road was, with an extravagance that bordered on wastefulness, it is highly satisfactory to think that it is now, in all likelihood, about to become a "paying" concern. This favourable state of things is largely due to the excellent management of General Manager Broughton, whom everyone we are sure will be most ready to congratulate on the success which has crowned his endeavours. It should also be a very great cause for gratitude to all who have the interests of their country at heart, for no evidence could well be stronger that the depression under which the Dominion has been labouring for some years past is being thrown off, and that we are entering upon an era of, let us hope, hitherto unexampled prosperity. The announcement of the declaration of this dividend is one that cannot fail to have a beneficial effect upon business throughout the whole Dominion, and will in this way be shown to be not less a cause than an effect. The evil results of extravagance which have been experienced for so many years in the management of this great line, should be a warning to those who may engage in other similar enterprises, or indeed in enterprises of any kind, to avoid the rock on which a wealthy corporation like the Great Western Railway Company so nearly made shipwreck.

INTERESTING ITEMS.

The Queen has granted Lady Dufferin[illegible] an additional pension to that which she already enjoys.

Toronto Aldermen are making an awful racket just now over the salary bill. Couldn't they let things stand as they are for some time? The tendency is generally to the rising side, but not always. Good men ought to be well paid.

A French chemist is reported to have given a striking proof of domestic affection. He condensed the body of his deceased wife into the grains of an ordinary seal, and had her highly polished and set in a ring. He made a nice income by betting with lapidaries and others that they could not tell the material of the seal in three guesses, and after pocketing the money would burst into tears, and say "It is my dear, dear wife."

The snow storms instead of being over for the season have been worse than ever. It snowed nearly in Scotland for seventy hours steadily, and, of course, by the end of that time, things were pretty well covered up. Away up in the North West it has been the same thing, and throughout Ontario it has not been very different. The days however, are getting long, and the strength of the sun is such, that much more inconvenience in this way is not to be expected. It is to be hoped that the melting will be gradual, and the spring freshets not very destructive.

The Boers are still giving a good deal of trouble. They are showing themselves first-rate marksmen and sturdy fighters, but there is not much use in expending a great deal of sympathy upon them, as if they were "free men battling for their hills." In this poor, suffering world there are plenty more deserving objects on which to expend both one's sympathy and tears. No more thorough going tyrants in their own way could be found than those same Boers, and the cry about their being old Puritans fighting for liberty is just so much rant, and very poor rant even at that.

How admirable the consistency in many ways of the American Republic! What noble examples has it not set before England and other places, of honour and fair dealing with weaker peoples. How faultless has been its own conduct in regard to the Indians. From what pure motives of charity and brotherly love have its wars with these nations been carried on. How entirely have her shop-keepers and accredited agents of Government combined to give the Red men elevated notions of American Christianity. How rarely is it brother Jonathan that charity and liberty begin at home! "A century of disgrace," is what a recent writer calls the doings of the Republic towards the Red man, and the phrase is just about right.

Garfield has been inducted into office, and everything goes on serenely so far. Some say his Cabinet is made up of mediocrities with no man of mark in the whole number except Blaine. Others are of quite a different opinion, and I think they are right. Whether the Cabinet, however, is mediocre or bright, it seems to give great satisfaction, and hopes are strong that Garfield's term will be a prosperous one. For a wonder his message was very short, written in good crisp English, with a manly ring about it throughout, which seemed to indicate that the new President knows what he is about, and is determined to let all understand that if any thought that he was a mere jack in the box, they will soon discover their mistake. The administration of Hayes was a very quiet, but a very useful one, and if Garfield leaves a personal record as satisfactory as his predecessor has done, he will be a happy man. By the way, that was a very narrow escape which Mr. Hayes made on his way home from the pomps and vanities of Washington. It was just a wonder that he and his family were not all killed in the collision which took place with the train on which he travelled.

The Irish difficulty still continues, but, as the Coercion Act is now in force, a good many of the most obstreperous talkers will soon find themselves within the four walls of a prison. The land bill has not yet been made known. It is to be hoped it will be satisfactory when it comes. In any case it is absurd nonsense to think that giving the wretched peasant farmers of Ireland their few acres of ill-cultivated land in fee simple will do much or any good. They are living, and have been for ages, in the most abject poverty. Their farming is of the most contemptible character. They multiply like rabbits in a warren, and suppose they had the ownership of their wretched little patches to-morrow what would it matter, unless they had more skill and greater thrift? The land laws no doubt need to be amended, but the number who want to live on the land is far greater than can do so with comfort. Make a peasant proprietary merely, and in twenty years things would be as bad as ever, with the land out of the hands of nine-tenths of these cultivators again and the same cry of the wretched for help would be raised, and with as good reason. Besides, what right has any man, who farms his five or ten acres, to have the State put him in possession of that or even to help him to get it, any more than the man in the city has a right to get a present of the house he occupies or the shop in which he does business? Free trade in land, with cheap, simple conveyances for small as for large lots is about all that Government can do. With, of course, security that the proprietors will not come and sweep up all the tenant's improvements without the slightest compensation. That sort of work has been going on too long, not only in Ireland but all the world over, and the sooner it is stopped the better will it be all round.

A Project for the Year 2,000.

Lake Mackenzie is one of those "possibilities of North America" recently suggested. The lake would result from a proposed closing of the northerly outlet of the valley of the Mackenzie River, at the line 60° north, and storing up the water of 1,260,000 square miles. And to this could be added the water of other large areas. It would be a lake of about 2,000 miles in length by about 200 of average width. Its surface would have an altitude of about 650 feet above sea level. It would cover with one continuous surface the labyrinth of streams and lakes which now occupy the Mackenzie Valley. It would be a never failing feeder for the Mississippi. It would connect with Hudson Bay and with the "great lakes," and also with the interior of Alaska by connecting with the Yukon and its affluents. By concurrent results and other "possibilities" it would become during some months of each year, a navigable water, adding not less than 12,000 miles of communication to the Mississippi. It would complete the interior lines of river courses by connecting them. Cutting the "divide" which now exists between the Mississippi and Mackenzie would do this. This work is small when measured by its results, and it becomes easy of accomplishment under the methods proposed. The connecting of the Upper Mississippi with the proposed Lake Mackenzie would be easily made if that lake had a surface at the proposed altitude of 650 feet above the sea. The outflow from such a lake, having a length of more than 2,000 miles from south to north, and draining a very wide range of altitudes and latitudes, would be a timely and enduring one. This lake would make possible and easy the straightening of the Lower Mississippi. It would also contribute to the proposed ship canal from Cairo, Ill., to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, by the almost straight line which cuts the Wabash Valley, the Lakes Erie and Ontario, and the Lower St. Lawrence. This commercial channel, receiving all the waters converging at Cairo, would complete the demand for a constantly open ship channel from the St. Lawrence to the sea by way of the Strait of Belle Isle. That demand can be complied with, and the shortest and best line of communication can be thus opened between the interior and the seaboard.—St. Louis Republican.

There is a story being freely circulated at the London clubs and in society that a mysterious man was traced into Windsor Castle, where he was last seen with a flat candlestick in his hand, and that it cannot be proved he ever came out. Many believe he is there still, conceal like the burglar at Bournemouth, who terrified Lady Faversham and her young daughter, and on coming out of his hiding place under the sofa coolly announced he had been there a whole day, and intended to let his companions in the following night to steal and plunder anything they could lay their hands on. The courage and sangfroid shown by the two ladies on the occasion were admirable beyond all praise. They showed no signs of surprise or alarm, rang the bell, and quietly ordered the servant answering it to hand the burglar over to the police. The burglar, in his turn was taken aback by this presence of mind and coolness that he forgot to try to escape, and allowed himself to be pinioned like a bird in a ... [illegible]

In spite of the troublous times in Ireland they are anticipating fine social gayeties there. Lady Cowper, the vice-regal chatelaine is to have Drawing-rooms and levees in March, and the Guinnesses are to give fancy balls.

Ayer's
Hair Vigor,
FOR RESTORING GRAY HAIR TO ITS NATURAL VITALITY AND COLOR.

It is a most agreeable dressing, which is at once harmless and effectual, for preserving the hair. It restores, with the gloss and freshness of youth, faded or gray, light, and red hair, to a rich brown, or deep black, as may be desired. By its use thin hair is thickened, and baldness often though not always cured. It checks falling of the hair immediately, and causes a new growth in all cases where the glands are not decayed; while to brashy, weak, or otherwise diseased hair, it imparts vitality and strength, and renders it pliable.

The VIGOR cleanses the scalp, cures and prevents the formation of dandruff; and, by its cooling, stimulating, and soothing properties, it heals most if not all of the humors and diseases peculiar to the scalp, keeping it cool, clean, and soft, under which conditions diseases of the scalp and hair are impossible.

As a Dressing for Ladies' Hair
The VIGOR is incomparable. It is colorless, contains neither oil nor dye, and will not soil white cambric. It imparts an agreeable and lasting perfume, and as an article for the toilet it is economical and unsurpassed in its excellence.

MATTERS DRAMATIC.

MR. PERCY WINTER, a son of the dramatic critic, has devoted himself to the stage, and has joined Miss Genevieve Ward's company.

IT is rumored that Salvini, on returning to Italy, will devote himself to the management of a school of dramatic art in Florence.

IT illustrates the lengths to which a fashion runs when a leading London music publisher says that a successful ballad nowadays must be written in a quaint, sharp, staccato style in vogue in the days of Queen Anne.

THE Metastasio Theatre at Rome caught fire last month, but the flames were easily extinguished, as there was little inflammable matter about the building, which is almost wholly of stone and brick. No theatre was ever burned down in Rome since the fall of the Roman empire.

"BALL this evening, dear?" inquired Desdemona of Othello, when she saw him loading up his old navy revolver. "No, not this evening, s'mother evening," he replied, as he reached for the pillow and wedged it softly down her œsophagus.

FIRST-CLASS singers of church music are in good demand. Miss Emma S. Howe, a well-known Boston vocalist, goes to Mr. Beecher's church, in Brooklyn, at a salary of $1000 a year. She succeeds Miss Hattie L. Simms, who goes to St. Thomas's New York. Mr. George Werrenrath is continued at Mr. Beecher's church as its tenor, at an advance of $500 on his salary.

ADELAIDE KEMBLE SARTORIS said of Braman's singing that when the little thickset Jewish-looking man stood up to sing a single line, "But the children of Israel went on dry land," then paused, and in the hush followed with three words, "through the sea," that seemed carved out of solid stillness, then "our breath failed and our pulses ceased to beat, and we bent our heads as all the wonder of the miracle seemed to pass over us with those accents, awful, resonant, radiant, triumphant."

AN exciting scene took place in Paris at the Opera ball, which was unusually brilliant. A young woman who had been standing near the buffet, perceiving a gentleman with whom she was acquainted passing by with a rival beauty, exclaimed: "I knew very well that you were deceiving me," and attempted to stab herself with a dagger that she had concealed in her domino. The force of the blow was suddenly deadened by an opportune piece of whalebone, and before the victim of the green-eyed monster could repeat the blow she was disarmed and arrested. The wound is very slight.

Eager for the Fray.

Beattie the poet was on one occasion presented by the manager of a theatrical company which visited Montrose with an order for two to the boxes. As a special treat Mr. Beattie asked a well-known character in the town, famous for his great height and bodily strength, named John Tweedale, to accompany him. The play was "Macbeth," and the tragic incidents seemed to have powerfully affected John, who was making his first acquaintance with the stage, for at that part of the play where the murdered Banquo stalks upon the scene, Beattie rose up hastily in his seat, and, extending his arms towards the actors, exclaimed, in earnest tones, "For Heaven's sake, gentlemen, stop the play; John Tweedale's flegged!" Silence at once fell upon the audience and actors, till up rose bulky John, whose anxiety to see the tragedy was gaining the better of his fears, and, with white, scared face cried out "It's a lee, gentlemen. I'm not the least flegged; gang on wi' the Slaughterin'."

Opera Glasses.

A writer of the Gaulois says that the grandmothers of the present generation of Frenchwomen did not make much use of opera glasses. The single opera glass came into use in the reign of Louis XIV.; under Louis XIV. no spectator who respected himself came to the theatre without one, as you may read in Marivaux's "Paysan Parvenu." The double glass or jumelle as at present in use was invented, according to Edward Fourmer's account, in 1825. The writer above referred to is right in saying that women used the opera glass but little; their attention was concentrated on the stage and on their own little group of friends. The modern woman makes, on the contrary, constant use of the opera glass. As soon as ever she enters her box or her stall she inspects the house, an operation which requires from ten mintes to a quarter of an hour. During the performance the inspection of la salle will be continued at intervals until the approximate value of each rival's toilet and jewels is fixed to the satisfaction of the lorgneuse. The manner of holding the opera glass is a point to be studied and adapted to the style of beauty. A woman who has fine arms will hold the glass with both hands; a woman who has fine hands will take off her gloves; a woman who has a long neck will recline back on her chair, and from time to time let the glass rest against her chin and make it give the effect of a mouche sur un ..., etc. In short, l'art de lorgner is worthy of a chapter in any treatise on coquetry. Jewelled opera glasses are now coming into fashion. Soon we shall hear that a really chic lady will pay 10,000 francs for her fan; 15,000 francs for her handkerchief, and 20,000 francs for her opera glass.

The King of Bavaria has given up drinking very old wines, and his Chancellor has recently sold to a London firm some of the most venerable wines that ever reached England. Among these the most noticeable are the Steinwein, grown in the Bavarian State vineyards ... grown in the year ..., and ... the famous comet year, 1811. The Church Organ.

THE GRAND OLD INSTRUMENTS OF EUROPE. THE GREAT DUTCH ONE AT HAARLEM.

Of all instruments this is the most noble, possessing powers of the greatest extent and variety. How the sober dignity of its tones harmonize with the dark massive pile which we walk around and view with wonder! While gazing on the heavy towers on high, its hollow tones within speak of mass and vespers, long gone by, and all the train of superstitious chivalry. And as we pace the long drawn aisles of light and shade, where the glowing beams of tinted windows fall on the youthful fair, kneeling to ask heaven's grace—so beautifully expressed by the poet:

"Rose bloom fell on her hands together pressed,
And on her silver cross soft amethyst,
And on her hair a glory like a saint."

How the solemn tones in heavenly grandeur roll along? It is only upon the Continent that we can enjoy these sublime sensations. Holland, the Low Countries and Germany are spread over with these majestic instruments in profuse variety. At Haarlem there is one of stupendous size; the effect of which surpasses everything the mind can conceive. They are sounds which seem to roll from the skies into the deep abyss of harmony. In the puritanical service of the Dutch, nothing but psalmody is performed. For the purpose of leading their immense congregations of not less than three thousand voices singing in unison, these organs are furnished with an enormous pipe called the vox humana, which so predominates over the rolling thunder of the double diapasons that you might conceive it to be the voice of a monster, concealed in the mountain of sounds. The grandeur of this organ is much augmented by the vastness of the church in which it stands. Higher than Westminster Abbey—it fills up the end of the large aisle, reaching from the roof, and from one side to the other, the pipes having the appearance of vast columns of silver. The extemporary flourishes which the organist introduces between the lines of the psalm, can only be compared to a commotion of the elements or the rolling of the surges upon the shore. The largest organs in England are but mere toys compared to this magnificent instrument, which strikes the senses with awe and wonder. The writer was in the organ loft of Westminster Abbey, when the king and queen of Owhyee, Sandwich Isles, where introduced by the Dean, and placed near himself in the choir. The king, a vulgar-looking man, perfectly black, dressed in a black coat, white waistcoat, and peagreen gloves, which were not long enough to conceal his sooty wrists, stood up the whole time of the service, gazing with amazement at the roof. The queen, a tall, fine, masculine figure, was struck upon the first burst of the organ, as to be thrown into extreme agitation, so much so, that she would have leaped out of the stall in which she was placed, had not her maid of honor (An English lady), prevented her by laying hands upon her. Every time the organ recommenced with its full volume of sound, this ... During the service she settled down into something like composure and at the conclusion was led out by the dean and ...

...The next morning a Dutchman, driving his cows through the lane on the way to pasture, saw one of them stop and snuff a fiddle that was lying in the grass, covered with dew. Then he saw Joost sprawled out upon the turf fast asleep. Near him was a yellow stone bottle, which although empty, still had the aroma of schnapps. Joost, when aroused, went toward home with a lame step and an aching head. Recalling his experiences of the night, he went back the same day, and there in the boulder was the exact print of the devil's cloven foot.

Profits by Tobacco Monopoly.

WHAT THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT MAKES OUT OF THE SALE.

Bismarck, finding the monopoly of tobacco manufacture to be a prominent source of prosperity to the French Government, proposes the same system for Germany. In the seventeenth century the French Government assumed the right to control the manufacture of tobacco, and in 1674 transferred the monopoly of manufacture to contractors, who agreed to pay for the privilege a sum based on the probable earnings. This system was in operation until the reign of the first Napoleon, when a commission appointed by him reported that the only way of benefitting both the Government and consumers would be for the State to manufacture tobacco exclusively. The reasons given were that the work being under one control would dispense with nine-tenths of the general expenses which would be incurred by individual manufacturers. The credit and capital of the State being greater than that of any individual, it could make use of all new discoveries and machines for simplifying labour, and thus reduce the cost; it would abolish all expenses of show, advertising, high-priced stores, &c., and having no interest in making a profit to the disadvantage of the consumer, would avoid all adulterations. The system went into practice in 1810, and has not since undergone any modifications. In 1811 the sales reached over 50,000,000 francs, the expenses being 31,000,000, and the net profit being 19,000,000. In 1878 the receipts were over 397,000,000 francs, the expenses about 65,000,000, and the net profit over 332,000,000. In this sixty-seven years the expenses were but little more than doubled, while the net profit has increased seventeen fold. As cigars, which constituted the principal part of the production, are made almost exclusively by hand, the reduction of expenses and the great growth of receipts were chiefly accounted for by the division in manual labour when united in large masses under one administration. The manufacture of matches is also a Government monopoly, and the profit from it, added to that of tobacco, amounted to 348,210,000 francs, or about $69,642,000, a sum sufficient at five per cent. to pay the interest on the five thousand millions levied in 1871 by Germany, and leave an overplus for amortization which by compound interest calculation, would sink the whole debt in thirty-... Government ... The average wages paid by the ... 6 1-5 francs a day, while jewellers, the highest paid of French workmen, received from private employers, but an average of 5 1-7 francs a day. In addition to paying the highest of average wages, the Government gives to its employees during sickness, or after a certain period of service, a pension so satisfactory that a position in the employ of the State is eagerly sought for by French workmen. The expenses of management, clerks, agents, storage, freight, &c., reached in 1878 but 1 1-7 per cent. on the gross receipts. French manufacturers and merchants expend 12 to 15 per cent. for these items.

THE Davidson County mines in North Carolina have yielded half of all the gold dug east of the Mississippi River, and the iron deposits are regarded as inexhaustible. In asking for the emigration of skilled laborers the State points to 66 cotton and woollen mills, 290 tobacco factories, 20 iron foundries, 10 furnaces, and the foundations of more mills to be built this summer. North Carolina is only fourteen hours ride from New York city, and it is claimed that the cost of a journey from here to the West will buy a good farm down there.

A vegetarian society has been founded in Paris, and has just issued its first Bulletin, in which we are told that the object of the society is to discover the "elementary regime most advantageous to the human species." Vegetarianism ought to commend itself to many French people, with whom "rosbif" and "biftek" are not the institution that they are in England. The great bulk of the French lower and lower middle classes, like the peasantry and the bulk of the working classes in Scotland, are vegetarians without being conscious of it, and probably from necessity.

THERE is a man in Hamilton who lives so fast that he is now absolutely older than his father; and it is thought he will soon overtake his grandfather. His mother, a quiet, elderly lady, he has left behind long ago, as well as two maiden aunts.

WILLIAMSFORD.

From our Correspondent.

Dear Sir.—The several services which continued for nearly eight weeks in the Methodist church here, we believe, resulted in good being done. A large attendance, good attention, first class order, and an increase in the membership of about 50, are one of the chief features of the services. The Minister in charge has said that in none of his past experience has had such universal good order. So much for the village that has by some been badly reported of.

We are informed that the Temperance Society here is in a very prosperous state at present.

Mr. Joseph Archer, while at his father's, fell from the loft in the barn, and recieved very serious and almost fatal injuries. Dr. McGregor promises recovery, complete, in a short time.

Correspondence.

Notice.—We wish it disinctly understood, that we do not hold ourselves reponsible for the opinions expressed by our correspondents.

To the Editor of the Standard.

Sir.—I was agreeably surprised to see the quality of Fall & Spring Wheat, Oats and Peas, now instore at Markdale Station. They are the best samples I have seen in any part of this western Peninsula. My first impression of the land in Bentinck, Glenelg and Artemesia, was that it was almost worthless, at least only fit for sheep pasture. Its ruggid, stoney surface, dotted with intervening gravelly knolls and ridges, on which by the way, when not cleared grow the finest of Maple Elm, Hemlock &c. Numerous ravenes or valleys watered by the purest and most abundant springs, which unite in little rivulets that meander along the base of the hills. The little streams are shaded with Evergreens, such as cedar, tamarick and balsam, all indicative, to my mind, of land unsuitable for grain raising; but the fact of 150.000 bushels of grain, such as referred to, being shipped from Markdale Station in one year, is the logic that dispels my former theory. I would advise those requiring good seed such as wheat, oats or peas, to procure it from this section of country. It is strange that land so productive of staple cereals is held by the present occupants at such low figures—say from $20, $25 and $30 per acre. The bad stage of cultivation in which the land is in at present throughout the Township [illegible] its legitimate value. There is a rich field for improvement, and large profits would be the result to those who may purchase at present prices. The production of grain is not the only pleasure peculiar to this section of country. Its valleys and streams are visited by the lovers of piscatorial sport from New York, Boston, Toronto, Hamilton and London, during the holidays. Angling for the sportive speckled trout is an amusing pastime. The abundance of fish in these limpid streams may be immagined from the fact that one hundred weight of trout has been taken by one angler in 8 hours, I have been told. It is said that two fools are necessary for successful fishing, viz:—One at each end of the rod. Well two negatives make a positive, so one hundred pounds of trout is a positive fact, whether secured by fools tact or tackle. The little village of Markdale is on the Toronto Grey and Bruce Railroad, otherwise called the narrow gauge, and distant from Toronto 8 or 9 hours run. The road is not desirable to travel by—being slow, suffocating, crooked and shaky, indeed it seems as if [illegible] out of some third-class railroad. It contains 10 or 12 stores, post office, telegraph offices, bank, three hotels and [illegible] Dr. Sproule, M. P., [illegible] village who is building a fashionable and expensive house. The villagers are looking forward to incorporation. [illegible] interests [illegible] by Mr. C. W. Rutledge, Editor and proprietor of the Standard. "HAIL beauteous, bounteous, gladsome Spring"—this was Mark Twain's prize poem —but the dire diseases incident to Spring, spoil the romance. THE Toronto News company have issued Josh Billing's Cook Book and Piktorial Proverbs. Josh says in the introductory remarks the receipts are not to be considered arbitnry, as he has never been able to cook his own goose just exactly right. Fifteen cents, to be had from all News dealers.

Thousands of bottles are used annually, and it is considered one of the standard preparations of the day.

GENERAL DRY GOODS, FURS, MILLINERY,

Ready-Made Clothing,

BOOTS AND SHOES,

Hats, Caps and Groceries

TO THE LOWEST POINT POSSIBLE,

and in order to do so,

Will Sell at and Under COST,

The stock is all new, well bought, and well worth the attention of the closet buyers. In GROCERIES you will find evrything of First-Class Value.

As I do not pursue the course of some of our windy Merchants of our neighboring Villages, of sending out numerous samples of cheap trash (with unscrupolous recommendations) outside our natural business relations, in order to impress the public that they are not properly treated by their more honorable dealers, and draw custom from the many.

You will find everything that I sell just as I represent it, and as good value as you can possibly get for your money anywhere, as I have always held that honorable dealing is the only true course for a business man.

My Groceries are all bought for strictly nett cash, consequently I can and will sell at

The Lowest Possible Prices!

For CASH and FARM PRODUCE

BUT NOT FOR CREDIT.

I have also in stock and for sale, a large quantity of

PURE SEED GRAIN!

Such as White Russian, Glasgow, Red Chaff, and other varieties of Spring wheat. Also Pure Clean Peas, Oats and Barley. Prime Timothy and Clover Seed; also Fresh Garden Seeds, and as it pays each and every Farmer to sow clean seed, you will make money by paying a few cents extra, and purchasing a good article.

I am now selling large quantics of

COARSE LAND SALT,

FOR MANURE.

Which will pay every Farmer Five Dollars for every one invested in it, and as I am anxious that every Farmer in this locality and neighboring Townships shall try it, have decided on selling in five and ... barrel lots at the Lowest Cash Price laid down by the car direct from the Manufacturers, and bought for nett cash at Bottom Prices.

I would also intimate that my

WOMAN GOSSIP

Changes of Fashion Which have Cast Fairy-Like Blondes in the Shade.

Some of the Tortures of Being in Style—Calcutta Women—Waifs, &c.

Tortures of Fashion.

Fashion is pitiless in putting clothes on women. The comfort of the wearer is never taken into consideration. She must make her body conform as far as possible to the shapes of her garments, and never mind the pinches, distortions, and exposures. To have her waist compressed and her abdomen held back, is too common to excite any protest; she endures those things as a matter of course. Tight and high-heeled shoes are also an ordinary torment; and it is unjust to say that she might wear loose ones if she would, for it must be borne in mind that neat feet are expected of her. Men's feet are partly covered by their trousers, and therefore do not show the full size; but women's have no such advantage, and when visible are seen for all they are worth. It will not do to enlarge them for the sake of ease; nor to lower the heels, for no device that improves them must be neglected. Going to the other end of a fashionable woman, we find her head covered or uncovered to suit the passing caprice of style. In the present cold weather, if she wears a bonnet, it is a mere strip across her back hair, affording not the slightest warmth. She goes with her brain chilled and her ears aching alongside a male escort which is muffled warmly from neck to pate. He condescendingly asks her if she is cold, and she replies, "Oh, no; I'm as warm toast," being careful not to let her teeth chatter. All along the whole length of herself, betwixt head and feet, she is subjected to tortures of dress. Pins stick into her in places that she cannot reach at the time; garters are too tight, and stop the circulation of blood in her limbs; corset-steels break, and the sharp ends prod her sides; changes from the flannels of every day to the bareness of evening costumes give her fully in spots when elaborately done up; she is covered with contrivances of ornament that a man would not bear the annoyance of, like tight gloves, heavy earrings, and uneven fastenings; and, above all, she is sure to itch in numerous places. I have known moments when I would have given my purse and contents for a good claw at the calf of my leg. Man grumbles at the slightest inconvenience in the way of dress; but woman

"Must sit on her style,
And continue to smile," though a bent pin is at that very moment under her. I mention these things so that the husband or father, when he sufferingly pays the bill for a fine female costume, may understand that the wearer is incidentally punished for her extravagance. Those "Olivette" ballet girls at the Fifth Avenue theatre looked free and untrammeled in their tights and jerseys; but some of them were tortured by stays, bandages and paddings into shapes which were handsomer than nature had given them, though not one-tenth as comfortable. An expert was employed in the symmetry department, and his treatment of the girls was with an eye single to the glory of the show. They were a great hit in their seeming freedom of attire, however, while those Nautch dancers at Daly's theatre, in all the real unrestraint of mere gauze, were pronounced unsightly and a failure.

It is a beautiful woman, indeed, who can let nature take the place of art to any great extent in her fashionable make-up.

Calcutta Women

The women of Calcutta are, as a rule, very beautiful, in so far as we can reconcile beauty with the olive complexion, but fade rapidly after reaching the age of maturity. It is not infrequently that we see women at the age of 25 with furrowed jowl and crow's feet visibly encroaching the corners of their large, lustrous, black eyes, and at the age of 30 may have a decided stoop and decrepit gait. The early decline is due to two causes. The very early and tender age at which nuptials are performed, and the destructive influence of the climate. Barring that relic of barbarism, the nose-ring, there is no creature more comely, more lovely than a "mem sahib" of Bengal, between the ages of 12 and 18. Cleanliness is their constant care, which is a virtue to begin with. A figure somewhat below the medium height, and unhampered by corset or weighty skirt, arrayed in a loose, flowing robe of white, the upper portion of which is thrown carelessly over the left shoulder, exposing to view the swelling bust and well-rounded arm. The upper portion of the body is encased in a sleeveless jacket, generally of some brilliant colour, and tastefully worked with silk, or gold and silver thread. The arm is bare from shoulder to wrist, which is encircled by many bands of either silver or gold. The lower part of the ample robe is drawn tightly over the hips and looped at the left side, defining boldly the contour of a faultless figure. These ladies, in the matter of stockings, are not desultory, as they wear no shoes, and, consequently, no stockings, and little of the ankle is visible between the borders of their robe and the curious little mirrored toe-rings and resonant bells. The luxuriant black tresses are parted at the forehead and combed in thick folds behind the ears, which are pierced in many places and studded thickly with jewelry, and fall in close braids over the shoulders.

It is possible for three people to keep the same secret, but only after two of them are dead.

The latest chic is for gentlemen to wear in their shirt-bosoms for evening dress buttons of mother-of-pearl, traversed with solder threads, as if they were sewed on with threads of gold. Sleeve-buttons are similar.

A soft voice in woman always goes with a gentle spirit. A gentleman sitting in a friend's parlor engaged in conversation with him was startled by a noise down stairs, and paused to ask: "What's that—a crash of crockery?" "No; that's only my wife calling to me."

A little girl in Boston calls one of her dolls, a jointless creature, "her woman's right doll." "But why do you call her so?" asked her aunt, a lecturer upon that much-discussed question. "Oh, 'cause Aunt X," the child answered, "she's just like you, she can't ever sit down and be comfortable."

Adele Terchout, a beautiful girl who flashed through Paris in the last year of the Second Empire, under the title of La Comete, with dresses from Worth, portraits by Cabanel, sonnets from Theophile Gautier, offers of marriage from ancient dukes, mansions in the Champs Elysees, equipages, and diamonds, died a week or two since, of a lupus, in a hospital.

A grand ball: They had a grand ball at Leadville to celebrate Washington's birthday. Over four hundred were present, six barrels of liquor were consumed, and seven men killed at a free fight, which was excellently managed. The whole affair was very recherche, and will be remembered as one of the most delightful social affairs that ever was enjoyed by the best society of Leadville.

Cupid's twists and turns: "Yes," said old Mr. Rich, "I'm bound my son shall marry old Mr. Wealthy's daughter, and, though they don't like each other, old Wealthy and I have arranged it. Two country spinsters were stopping at a friend's house in Boston after their return from a scientific lecture. They occupied the same department, and shortly after midnight one of them started up, and, awaking the other, exclaimed in great trepidation: "Betsey, I believe there is a man under the bed!" Betsey merely raised her finger in an admonitory way, and replied: "Don't make a noise then, Jane; you might scare him away."

A sad case: Two loving beings that had plighted their truth some years ago, and were about to be married, are separated forever. They were sitting together one evening, going on about as usual, when she observed to him rather pensively: "Charley, you don't understand anything about hugging; you haven't got the knack of it." "Indeed," he replied in a disheartened tone, "that's very strange, for I've been practising on two or three other girls for several months."

Elocutionary Aspirants.

QUEER PERSONS WHO THINK THEY POSSESS DRAMATIC TALENT.

"There are some queer persons who try to learn elocution," a well-spoken professor said. "It is really surprising to see with what persistence those who are positively disqualified will strive to acquire the declamatory art. Public school education is responsible for a good deal of this. Take a class of college boys; they are almost men, marked. It is obvious that some of them have no aptitude for elocution. Their voices are inadequate; their action is irretrievably bad. Yet the curriculum requires that they should declaim regularly. No amount of natural disqualification relieves them from the duty. The result is that they only furnish sport for their companions, and go through the college course with only a perfunctory performance of this part of their duties. Of course, this is in direct conflict with the most advanced thought on the subject of education. Both common sense and science dictate that it is a waste of time to try to teach some persons some things. Vast sums of money and long periods of time might be saved by refraining from attempts to perform the impossible in teaching.

"But there are some funny instances of persons of more mature years trying to learn elocution. Persons who have had little or no education in school, who can neither read or pronounce, to whom a proper name is an insurmountable obstacle and a word beyond the commonplace, a Rubicon, think they can be fitted to shine in elocution. Those persons always trip up on pronunciation. They make the most ludicrous blunders without the faintest conception why they are laughed at. You may say that we ought not to try to teach such persons. You might as well say that a dry-goods merchant should not sell unbecoming goods. Here is a young fellow who is doing moderately well in business. He goes into company and finds that elocution is all the rage. He sees others brought into prominence by readings and recitations. He thinks that he can make his mark, and he comes to me or some other professor to get instruction. I had a young grocer who took a notion to read Shakespearean pieces. He tripped over every unusual word, he stumbled over every proper name, and he absolutely fell down on the point of memory. It was only by dint of hard hammering that I could get him drilled into one twenty-minute reading. Finally I got tired taking his money, and had to send him away.

"Then I had a fat, fussy little fellow, who took a notion to play Hamlet, with a dramatic association. I told him frankly that his physique was not fit for the character. Imagine the melancholy Dane with a paunch! I had a big butcher once who wanted to play Claude Melnotte. He was better fitted to lug a side of beef than to toy with Pauline. It seemed wrong to take his money, but I was afraid to tell him the truth. I believe the audience cured him at his first and last attempt. But the climax of absurdity was a little bantam fellow, who took a fancy for heavy parts. He wanted to play Coriolanus, or Richard III., or other parts that required voice and action. I never saw him trying one of those characters without thinking of the fable of the toad and ox. His tragedy was always very funny. When I first began teaching I used to try to get these fellows to listen to the truth. I got no thanks for my honesty, and only lost my customers. Now, when any one comes to me to be taught I do the best I can to teach him. I never get tired taking their money as long as they don't get tired paying.

"Some of the toughest customers we have are the young women. They think that if they are healthy and good looking they have a good capital for the stage. As a matter of fact, some of the most successful actresses have not been by any means good-looking women. Charlotte Cushman was by no means handsome, and Sarah Bernhardt has been the butt of ridicule for her lack of what are usually called personal charms. But there are hundreds of young women, with capital to back them who think they can be fitted for the stage in a few lessons. They have no previous education or training. They are trying to read without learning their letters. They can only look pretty. They cannot comprehend why a word may not be pronounced one way as well as another. They take a correction as a personal offense. As for the properties of time, place and circumstance, they know them not. These young women are the bonanzas of professors of elocution. Every season finds them in the field. They get their admirers to hire neglected theatres and give them a chance. They struggle manfully or womanfully with Pauline or Ophelia, or some one of the characters in society plays. Each part requires special teaching. Of course if we should advise them as we know, we should say to them: 'You had better abandon the stage and save your money.' As it is, we merely say: 'Great is Diana of the Ephesians, for by this craft we have our wealth.'

"Other pupils are the infant phenomena. They are the most vexatious. It is well known if a man is tall he tries to appear taller; if a woman has a small foot she tries to make it smaller. So if wealthy persons have a youngster who shows a talent for spouting they try to develop it. It always makes me sad to see a stripling spluttering and struggling with some terrific effect of declamation when he ought to be playing tag or hop scotch. But there would be no use in my telling the parent that. They would only go to some other professor. So I just sing it is to some poor folks that rich folks will spend their money foolishly."

A Bride's Terror.

The following is told by The Cheyenne Sun, of recent date:

On the west-bound Union Pacific train on yesterday was a newly-wedded pair, who were as loving and tender as people in that interesting condition of life usually are. They had a section in a sleeping-car and were on a bridal trip to the Pacific coast. Near Sidney a wheel on the sleeper was broken, and the train stopped at that place about an hour to put on a new pair of wheels. Here, during the delay, Mr. Goodwin, who is the bridegroom alluded to, got out to kick up his heels and look around, and while he was absorbing the beauties of nature and some other things about the town, the train, which is one of those things that doesn't wait for time or the "tied," quietly rolled out, leaving Mr. Goodwin, and bearing away his bride. Then there was consternation in Sidney, and on board the Pullman. The bride was in a state bordering on distraction because of her lost liege, and vainly, though frantically, did the groom put in his best locomotion to catch the retreating train. As he and the bride were one, with a very clear case of "a poor eager one on board that was left behind" it was fun to everybody else except the two most deeply interested. Failing to catch the train on foot, he clambered into the cab of a locomotive which happened to be puffing about the place, and [illegible] solicited the engineer, a [illegible] man with a [illegible], saw how it was, and proceeded to obtain proper authority as quickly as possible, and started with Mr. Goodwin on a stern chase after the flying train, that was trying to make up an hour of lost time, and which was provided with a new pair of wheels. Away the extra locomotive sped, on the wings of love and sympathy and steam. Goodwin pulled the engineer and fireman, and helped to shovel coal, and at Antelope, thirty-seven miles away, the wild-eyed, panting husband overtook the bride [illegible] ... had run away with ... [illegible] HOUSE.

IN THE CATACOMBS OF PARIS—[illegible] IN HUMAN BONES—A [illegible] INTO THE DARK, DARK CAVERNS OF DEATH—[illegible] [illegible] JOKES.

[illegible]

Yankees are no match for Frenchmen in practical economy. The Parisians make even their bones pay. They use their own bones. When they are through with them, and they have gone through the formality of a few years' burial, they are dug up, put in the catacombs, and made a show of for visitors. There is always a visitor. Many thousands of strangers a day linger in Paris, and that is where the profit comes in, and is wrung out of these clever people. So the bones of the grand and great grand-parents of the present generation of Frenchmen, [illegible] ... with the rats scuttling through them, are still useful. I went down among those thousands and thousands of dead men and women in company with some three hundred living men and women of all tongues and countries. It was on Thursday—a visiting day. The other "visiting day" is Saturday. The entrance to these tombs is at the Boulevard d'Enfer, or boulevard of Hell, if you want the English of it. [illegible] ... the [illegible] of the swarming three hundred bought a candle. The end of each candle was stuck in a square bit of pasteboard which protected one's dress from the drippings. There were two hundred candles two more [illegible] ... three visitors is [illegible] ... know this, and the French were not going to tell us and spoil the sale of two hundred candles. Having bought the candles we, the three hundred, were in a bare yard partly inclosed by high board fence. We waited at least two hours. Waiting is a [illegible] in Paris. The native population is brought up to wait, and will confidently sit in a street-car a full hour ere it is time to start, and knowing this too—a thing which no American could [illegible] ... after the French drizzling fashion. There was no shelter save umbrellas. Two hundred umbrellas were raised. The three hundred stood under them and longed to see the bones below. The rain ceased. Still we waited, candles in hand. Some bright spirit thought to light his or her candle. There we stood with our three hundred candles burning and three hundred people waiting.

STILL WE WAITED.

The candles burned, flickered, flared, and spluttered. Then some more cautious and economic spirit thought to blow his candle out. All the rest blew their candles out. Why burn the candles in the full light of the day when the dark catacombs were waiting for us all below, full of bones? Another half-hour passed. Conversation went on in English, American, French, Italian, German, Spanish, and Yankee. We waited and wondered, for no one was seen about who seemed in authority over the bones. Then a report was spread among us that something or somebody was coming to do something about it. At this all again lit their candles. But nothing was done. The candles burned dejectedly. Fifteen minutes afterward the economic spirits commenced putting theirs out again. As before, every one else then put theirs out. The candles smoked and smelled vigorously. Thus passed two hours, and not a bone. Suddenly a door at the upper end of the yard was thrown open. The time had come. The three hundred again lit their candles and crowded toward the opened passageway. Here we were strained through one at a time. This unexpected delay caused a congestion of the entrance of men, women, and candles. The nearer one got to the straining point the worse became this congestion, so that we were wedged into a solid mass of humanity-lighted candles. People's arms became caught and fastened in certain positions by the pressure; so were their candles, which blazed, burned, and blackened whatsoever they touched. The candle had no option in the matter, nor did the person who held it, nor did the person burned by it. Emerging from this in single file, some with scorched or greased coats and dresses, we found ourselves in the passageway leading to the hole. Then we went down ninety-two steep stone-steps, and traversed a long passageway underground without meeting any bones. Thus we tramped a long time in single file without seeing a bone. On the rocky ceiling was a

CONTINUOUS BLACK MARK.

This followed would lead to either entrance, and so afford any laggard a sure guidance. Underneath the mud in places was greasy in consistency, tarry in tenacity, and whitish in colour. It was the gypsum mud abounding in Paris. It lumped on our shoes, and gradually overspread our garments, which broke out in irregular white patches.

At last the long-wished-for piles of disjointed skeletons came into view. They were "faced up," with skulls and the larger bones in front, as regularly as a pile of bricks. But behind all was osseous confusion. Rib-bones and skulls, tibias and fibulas, backbone joints and breast bones, bits of skulls with moldy hair attached, leg bones and arm bones, all piled together by the ton, by the million, all of the dull, rusty colour which bones assume in damp places. Here were skulls once covered by the bonnet rouge. Here were fleshless jaws which had howled at Louis XVI., and roared the first Marseillaise; rib of aristocrat, leg of canaille, arm of beauty, foot of fish woman, and all the interstices filled with the little feet and finger bones of the thousands of the past and forgotten Jeans and Jacques, Jeanettes, Josephines, Paulines, Blanches, and Louises, who lived and suffered and sinned and enjoyed and died generations ago—all flung here, a horrible kaleidoscope mass of like the rusty wheels and springs of 10,000 old clocks piled in a heap. These heaps were dated 1792, 1806 and 1814, and upward. The inscriptions over the various piles were in some cases from scripture, in others from Rousseau and other writers. The older the sepulture the more frequent and voluminous the epitaphs. For the present, they seemed content without a line. Perhaps they deem that bones now carry their own sermon. A man ahead of me busied himself with pulling out the teeth of every skull he could reach. He may have been a dentist after new stock. We passed vacant spaces between the heaps of bones which yawned into horrible darkness and were barred with chains to prevent live idiots from straying away into them. A young German did his best to lose himself in these forbidden spots. He would turn aside, go as far as he could, until his progress was arrested, then lean over the chain and howl. Others of the party at times howled and shouted. There is a species of man that always does this in strange places. It seems their only means of expression. Another visitor tapped every skull within reach with his stick. Many of the women laughed and [illegible] ... what remained of human beings. And why not laugh? Why all this conventional solemnity in the presence of the cast-off mechanisms of men and women? Looked at in the light of a chemical anatomical sentiment, there is no occasion for depression. It is only a mass of phosphate of lime, and put in its proper place would insure a good crop of wheat or vegetables.

I noticed that many of the skulls were pierced with holes either about the forehead or temples. I thought these might be the mementoes of barricades and street fights. Then it occurred to me that the holes had been made by the sharp pick-points while they were being disinterred, and all the battle romance was taken away. Because the poorer Frenchman only holds his six feet two of earth for a few years when he is dug up to make room for another to go through the decomposing process. It's a sad thought, and a sad sight, too, to see these temporary resting places of the dead. Over the remains of husband or child the may, for a few years, be seen Sunday after Sunday caring for the few flowers she has planted. But the slender purse may only afford a five-years' grave, and that time expired the workmen tears away the slender, humble wooden paling, [illegible] ... little wooden cross, and roots up the flowers. The bones are dug up and added to those nameless piles before us, to become a show and even jest for visitors. The grave receives another occupant, and another mourner plants flowers upon and hangs immortelles over it. All about poverty's burying grounds of Paris may be seen idly [illegible] the little toys in plaster of [illegible] ... placed by ... [illegible] ... over the bones of those now exhumed children. The immortelles, swept away from graves where ... [illegible] ... in the catacomb, lie in great heaps on the borders of these cemeteries, and the little plaster or china toy which covered the temporary grave of infancy is tossed about on every side, as well as the temporary wooden crosses ... [illegible]

BULLET PIERCED SKULLS,

[illegible] ... known the size and history of it [illegible] ... and each of [illegible] ... we are [illegible] ...

The fronts of these bone piles are ornamented with fancy work in bones. The designs in skulls, leg bones and thigh bones are wired together. ... [illegible] ... of me kept saying, "How pretty!" ... French People ... [illegible] ... his taste. I couldn't admire it.

[illegible] WORK IN SKULLS.

[illegible] ... suggest Dahomey and a savage cannibalistic taste in the fine arts. However, it doesn't hurt the bones, and perhaps the coming man will be so hard-hearted by continuous applications of science and reason that he will trim his parlor with the polished skulls of generations of ancestors. We came to a spring in a larger vaulted room. The water was clear and limpid, but no one drank. Through too much [illegible] ... [illegible] ... brandy and [illegible] ... dry. I do not think that the sight of so many bones conduces to a total abstinence practice. Though the [illegible] ... the desire for spirits does not always fly from the living. I confess this is a ghastly joke. But it was born there in the catacombs. By this time we were tired of bones and wished only to reach the other end of the tombs. Bones had ceased to [illegible] ... One heap was as good as forty. The crazy, howling young German had been [illegible] ... got lost, and issued howls with less fervor. The dentist's pockets were, I believe, half full of teeth, and the skull-tapper with the cane seemed to have satisfied himself that they were all empty. The awe and terror of the ladies had partly given way to a sense of vexation as the blotches of white mud continued to break out on their gowns and its paste to incumber their thin shoes.

In France it is supposed that a fee must come in somewhere during the course of a free show. So, as the long line of 300 in single file neared the other side of the catacombs and those at the head struggling down the stairway, they put their hands in their pockets and rattled the sous there, expecting that the inevitable official would appear somewhere and hint at his expected gratuity. Those in the rear, hearing the rattling, guessed at its meaning and dived down into their pockets and likewise rattled, and thus this thought and consequent rattling of coppers went along from one to another down the long line of three hundred until the very last man fell before it, just as the extreme brick in the row is the last to fall when the first is tipped over. Strange to say, no fee taker appeared. The bones were genuinely gratuitous. All the pennies went back to the pockets again. All expected of us were our half, or rather quarter-burned candles. These were flung in a heap, and became somebody's perquisites. Three hundred quarter-burned candles make a very creditable accumulation of tallows, and are probably sold over again to the next visitors. It was interesting when one had emerged to wait and see our companions as they came out of the dark hole. They blinked like owls. As the light struck their eyes their faces assumed a dazed, imbecile sort of expression. After recovering vision, their next regards were fastened at the white mud stains on their clothes. As the full extent of the damage dawned upon them, and on turning their heads over their shoulders they found their respective rears to be even in a worse condition than the front, they swore in various tongues.

Modern Witchcraft

HOW A DESIGNING SCOUNDREL TOOK ADVANTAGE OF A SUPERSTITIOUS FAMILY.

(Buffalo Courier)

Two years ago the family of Michael Bender, consisting of himself, his wife, and three daughters, who reside in the town of Clarence, become the victims of an unfortunate hallucination. They believed they had been bewitched by a highly respectable family in the neighborhood, the oldest of five daughters belonging thereto being accredited with having originated the evil spell. If one of the Benders was ill, if the live stock on the farm took sick, strayed away, or were injured, or if there was any occurrence of an unpleasant nature it was attributed to the witches. There also lived in the town a decrepid German, 65 years of age, named Benedict Smith, who claimed the power of curing disease by incantation or the pronouncing of cabalistic words, as well as the ability to neutralize and prevent the doings of evil spirits which might endanger the life, health, liberty and happiness of mankind. To him the Benders applied to have the witches which besieged them and their house exorcised, and in response he went through certain forms whereby he claimed to rid them of the annoyances to which they believed themselves subjected. They were all very superstitious and had frequent recourse to Smith for this kind of relief, so that he became a regular visitor to the family in order to carry on his performances in an effectual manner. Finally some of the neighbors, being more observing than others, discovered that Mrs. Bender and her daughters, the youngest only 17 years of age, were accustomed to visit Smith's house, and that to avoid being seen, as they hoped, they made their way stealthily through a strip of woods to the hovel in which he lived. He had been cunning enough to take advantage of their ignorance and idle fancies, and had so worked upon their feelings that he had them completely under his control. They were always ready to do whatever he might ask of them, and what has recently transpired concerning the mysterious visits makes up a starting and revolting story, which stamps Smith as a consummate scoundrel. The neighborhood is excited, and were it not for the fact that he has been safely lodged behind the bars of the country jail, he would stand a fair chance of being summarily dealt with.

Last Saturday Smith made his appearance before Mr. Samuel Freeman, Justice of the peace, accompanied by Katie Bender, the youngest of the family, and stated that they desired to be made man and wife; that she was in a delicate condition, for which he believed himself to be responsible, and that he was desirous to shield her honor and legitimatize their prospective offspring. Nevertheless the scoundrel knew he had on the 17th of september, 1877, married Josephine Johnson, who subsequently deserted him and is still living. Justice Freeman, however, performed the ceremony. When the particulars of the marriage became generally known the indignation of the people was very great and a warrant was sworn for Smith arrest. He was taken into custody that evening and Justice Freeman committed him to await the action of the grand jury. On Monday the prisoner was brought to Buffalo and given into custody of Jailer Tucker. The girl has confessed that when she and her sisters and mother visited Smith at his home they did so for the purpose of being treated for ill health. The treatment given them was certainly peculiar. The old man would procure a tub of scalding hot water, and he and the women would assume the most primitive of costumes. One would wrap herself in a sheet, and while seated over the tub receiving a steam bath, the others would dance about her in a fantastic manner, chanting a weird song. Each one of the women took a bath after this fashion, and all fell a prey to the designs of their "doctor." Katie believes that as a consequence there is a possibility of her mother and sisters being in a condition equally as critical as her own.

Smith is a blear-eyed, disgusting specimen of humanity, whose body is bent and palsied with age.

During the past twelve years the population of the city of Toronto, where the International Sunday School Convention is to be held, has increased fifty-two per cent. The total population, including the suburban villages outside the city limits, closely approaches 90,000. Toronto has every prospect of outstripping her eastern rival, Montreal, and is rapidly becoming one of the leading cities on the Western Continent. For people with means who wish to settle in a flourishing and progressive city, it is held up by Londoners as a most desirable place, possessing good society, the excellent educational advantages afforded by the Divinity colleges, universities, and public and private schools, healthy climate, and easy access to the best sporting grounds in the province. So says the New York Sun.

A statement has recently been made by the Adjutant-General ... [illegible]

[illegible] ... little birds collect in the trees in crowds, and when a flock of pigeons come sweeping over they make a rush for them in a body and take right hold, tooth and nail, and so the pigeons swoop down to get out of the way, they are literally chased out of the Park.

In the pigeon case in the museum are some of the bones of that [illegible] ... unlimited bird the giant of pigeons, being the only specimen in this country. Two hundred and fifty years ago they were found in the Mauritius Islands in great quantities. It was a curious bird, as large as a swan. The bill in the case is not unpigeon-like, though one hundred times the size of its modern representative. They were sluggish birds, unable to fly, and laid a single egg about the size of a turkey's. Bontius, an old Dutch writer at the period, gives the following quaint account of them: "The dronte, or dodders, is, for bigness, of mean size between an ostrich and a turkey, from which it partly differs in shape and partly agrees with them, especially with the African ostriches, if you consider the rump, quills, and feathers, so that it was like a pigmy among them, if you regard shortness of legs. It hath a great ill-favored head, with a kind of membrane resembling a hood; great black eyes; a bending, prominent, fat neck; an extraordinary, long, strong, blue-white bill, only the ends of each mandible are a different color—that of the upper black, that of the nether yellowish—both sharp pointed and crooked; its gape huge, wide, as being naturally voracious. Its body is fat and round, covered with soft, gray feathers, after the manner of an ostrich's on each side. Instead of hard wing feathers, or quills, it is furnished with small soft-feathered wings of a yellowish ash color, and behind, the rump, instead of a tail, is adorned with five small curled feathers of the same color. Four toes on each foot—solid, long, as it were, really armed with strong black claws." They at one time were so plentiful that they were killed for the stones that were found in their stomachs, and on which the sailors sharpened their knives.

[illegible]

ANOTHER QUEER PIGEON

that lived at that time, and which is now extinct, is the solitaire. It was found on the island of Rodriguez. It was larger than a turkey, and in general respects resembled the dodo. Another was the Nazarene, that was twice as large as the dodo. But the most remarkable was the didunculus, a living relative, and closely allied to the dodo. The bird was rather larger than our common partridge, and possessed the curious naked skin surrounding the eyes which characterized its ancestor.

One of the finest of the thirty or more different species of pigeons is the Oceanic fruit bird of the Pelen Islands. There they are found in thousands, feeding on nutmegs. They become very fat, and the fat, which has a strong flavor of the nutmeg, is considered a great dainty by many. It is said that they grow so fat that when shot they fall on the ground, and are shattered to pieces by the fall. Not only are they valuable as a means of subsistence, but they seem to have been appointed to help carve out the laws of nature. It is a well-known fact that the nutmeg has to pass through some chemical process before it will grow, and in the stomach of these birds the nutmeg is prepared for reproduction.

Among this family of birds

THE PASSENGER PIGEON,

is one of the most wonderful. Wilson's description of their camping grounds is: "As soon as the young were fully grown, and before they left their nests, numerous parties of the inhabitants from all parts of the country came with waggons, oxen, beds, cooking utensils, many of them accompanied by the greater part of their families, and encamped for several days at this immense nursery. Several of them informed me that the noise in the woods was so great as to terrify their horses, and that it was difficult for one person to hear another person speak without bawling in his ear. The ground was strewn with branches, broken limbs, eggs, and young squab pigeons which had been precipitated from above, and on which herds of hogs were fattening. Hawks, buzzards, and eagles were sailing about in great numbers, and seizing the squabs from their nests at pleasure, while from twenty feet upward to the top of the trees the view through the trees presented a perpetual tumult of crowding and fluttering multitudes of pigeons, their wings roaring like thunder, mingled with the frequent crash of falling trees." It is utterly impossible to estimate the numbers that congregate together. On some trees more than three hundred nests were found, and the branches were continually falling, owing to the weight of the old birds. The amount consumed by a flock of these birds is wonderful. Wilson calculates that, taking the breadth of a column of pigeons he saw to be only one mile, its length to be 250 miles, and to contain only three pigeons in each square yard (taking no account of the several strings of birds one above the other), and that each bird consumes half a pint of food daily, all of which assumptions are below the actual amount, the quantity of food consumed in a day would be 17,000,000 bushels. Supposing this column to be and flying at the rate of one mile a minute for four hours, and supposing that each square yard contains three pigeons, the square yards in the whole space, multiplied by three, would give 2,230,000 birds! In the Kentucky country, where they are mostly found, they appear suddenly, darkening the sky so completely that all work and labor is given up until they have passed. The air is literally filled with pigeons, and in some places mortars are used to bring down hundreds at one discharge. Their rapidity of flight is wonderful.

ONE MILE IN BREADTH,

The wood doves or ring pigeons are better known in France than elsewhere. Our domestic pigeon is only a modification of the blue rock pigeon, and this is proved by the fact that if the domestic and blue or wild rock is allowed to breed the young will in many cases resemble the wild rock, with its plain plumage and barred wings. The domestic pigeons are divided into two classes, the colombrio and the aviary pigeons. The former are almost wild, and the latter are those with which we are so familiar.

The question how

CARRIER PIGEONS,

find their way home is probably one never to be determined. Some writers assert that the birds are guided by land-marks, and give as proof, that when the ground is covered with snow the birds are confused, and others say that they are influenced by some magnetic or electric current, and on this point it is noticed that birds either fly east or west, north or south, and when started rise at a great height, and for a minute hesitate, and then by unknown instinct they dart off in the right direction. The exact date of their utilization is not known, but as far as we know, Noah had the honor of having first pressed into service our feathered friends. Pliny says that these birds were used by Bruno and Hirtius during the seige of a town by Marc Antony. In 1574, at the seige of Leyden, they were used by the Prince of Orange, and by their means he succeeded in [illegible] ... beseiged. To show his gratitude he ordered that the sagacious birds should be fed on strawberries, and when dead that they should be embalmed with all honors. In Pliny's time navigators from Cyprus and Egypt carried these birds on their galleys, and on their safe arrival liberated them to convey the good news to their families. Of the different kinds of carrier pigeons the Belgian bird is preferred. It has a short beak, large round head, and broad shoulders. The fancy carrier, with large wattles on the beak, is often used, but is vastly inferior to the former.

[illegible]

They are, we must confess, somewhat plebeian or vulgar, though it is difficult too to see just how that can be, as they are greatly practised by many who consider themselves the very "salt" of the fashionable world. Now, for example, to take that very ordinary occupation of riding in a carriage, and by this we will understand in the meanwhile, riding in any sort of a conveyance whatever. For the same remarks will in great measure apply to the nobleman's coach and four, and to the butcher's cart and horse. Man is assuredly a "riding" animal, no less certainly than he is a "clothes-wearing" animal, or an animal marked by any other more or less prominent characteristics. Whether it be merely from the inspiriting sensation which springs from experience of a motion more rapid by far than any to which we can hope to aspire by the unaided appliances of nature, or from the feeling, however momentary and in other respects even disappointing, of being raised above the "madding crowd's" ignoble strife, certain it is that mankind everywhere and always have been extremely fond of riding, unless indeed we except that form of locomotion usually called "riding on a rail," which has not yet become so popular as it might be. Yet who knows that this very means of transit may not become in the highest degree fashionable, when the progress of time and the rapid advance of civilization have brought the more usual contrivances within reach even of the vulgar. Fashion consisting largely in a

CEASELESS STRIVING AFTER.

What the fewest can have, or care to have, we wonder that this very simple expedient has never occurred to anyone. Now has anybody, we wonder, watched with the eye of a philosopher, the processes of getting out of and entering a carriage, and the still more difficult and intricate process of sitting there, without feeling that there is here an "art," and, in some of its manifestations at anyrate, a very "fine" one? And by no means a simple one either, as any person may convince himself in five minutes by trying to adopt that easy, graceful lounge in the corner of a carriage seat, that apparently artless and natural, taking of one's wholly deserved ease, which can only come by long and assiduous practice. "Mind" must be bestowed on this as on every other art, or no excellence can be attained therein. That seraphic loll beneath the robes and wrappings, that calm survey of all things here terrestrial, is no effort of pure unaided genius, but the reward of labour and much hard toil. And indeed to the thinking mind it will readily appear that to look up from the depths or down from the heights of a carriage on the laboured motions of more sluggish and peripatetic humanity, with the proper admixture and commingling of urbane generosity and loftiness of demeanour is not by any means an easy thing, and that any one who attains that height of perfection is worthy of great regard and commendation. Being an art that requires extensive and all-engrossing attention, it will be found in all likelihood to be brought to the highest state of perfection by members of the female persuasion, as these have in general more unoccupied time on their hands than their sterner companions, as also a more intimate and accurate regard for all external aids to dignity and virtue, likewise to beauty. Some of the sex make a practice of using the eyeglass to assist their surveys. This instrument it will be found is largely used when the vehicle has been brought to a standstill, and there is reason at once for examining the world of mankind from a height, even though that height be a comparative mole-hill, and of keeping up the requisite degree of self-possession. We cannot recommend this practice, however. It is striking, no doubt, and sure to make

WALKERS FEEL THEIR INFERIORITY,

if anything will, but there is something mechanical about it. Nothing to the bold supercilious glance of the naked eye. Much might be said as to the genesis of this art, if time and space permitted, but enough has already been advanced to cause the intelligent readers of Truth to think for themselves. It is an ancestral habit in all likelihood, and has been "developed" from a very lowly stage. The very earliest germ of this carriage-riding propensity in mankind is doubtless the sensations experienced by one of our protoplasmic ancestors when he found himself undergoing some rocking motion, whether on a blade of grass or elsewhere. The same feeling of complacency which is frequently manifest in the countenance of him or her who rides in a carriage, is visible also not seldom in the face of him whom we are taught to regard as another of our ancestors—the monkey—namely, when swinging on the branch of a tree. But all such profound speculations as to the genesis and developement of this interesting phenomenon must be kept for another issue at anyrate.

PEARLS OF TRUTH.

In a battle of the elements, they generally get the drop on us.

We are oftener more cruelly robbed by those who steal into our hearts than by those who break into our houses.

All great things are done little by little. Atoms make worlds. The greatest fortunes consist of farthings. Life is made up of moments.

The effusions of genius, or rather the manifestations of what is called talent, are often the effects of distempered nerves and complexional spleen, as pearls are morbid secretions.

Poverty has, in large cities, very different appearances. It is often concealed in splendour, and often in extravagance. It is the care of a great part of mankind to conceal their indigence from the rest. They support themselves by temporary expedients, and every day is lost in contriving for to-morrow.

The pursuit of truth in its countless variety of forms is one of the great aims of life. All desire it in some measure, and the degree to which the love of truth triumphs over appetite, passion, and inferior desires, determines the character of the man. Besides this, all human interests are involved in and dependent upon it.

A Batch of Spanish Proverbs.—It is easy to undertake, but more difficult to finish a thing. This term is equally applicable to all ranks—Whoever is ignorant is vulgar. By the street of By-and-by one arrives at the house of Never. Between the "Yes" and "No" of a woman man should not undertake to thrust the point of a pin. Patience and shuffle the cards. A soldier had better smell of gunpowder than musk. Other men's pains are easily borne. A bad cloak often covers a good drinker. Pray devoutly and hammer on stoutly. When a thing is once begun, it is almost half finished. Lay a bridge of silver for a flying enemy.

[illegible] ... as a fact that life prisoners are [illegible] ... the [illegible] ... they may seem to be, they have no [illegible] ... an attempt is being made to amend the penal code of California by having life sentences commuted upon the life insurance tables, and permitting the discharge of a prisoner after the term he was likely to live, when sentenced, has expired.

The crest emblazoned on a San Francisco millionaire's carriage, a rising sun, is considered appropriate, because he has risen from [illegible] ... and his wife from domestic service.

[illegible]

[illegible] ... ly wonder, I think, that the ancients sought in every way to win her approbation.

[illegible] ... they said, in no beautiful palace, but in hollow mountain caves, apart from men, where she fostered and cherished the souls of those little children who had died an early death. There, in her kingdom under the earth, she plowed the ground with her plow, the little souls working with her the while, it being their part to water the fields.

The most beautiful tradition connected with this heathen goddess is that known as the "Legend of the Pitcher of Tears." Full as this legend is of contradictory ideas, it shows the grief that mothers feel when their little ones die, and how the hope of one day meeting them again helps them to bear long and sorrowful years of loneliness.

Lady Bertha was once passing with her little train down a green and lovely meadow-land, across whose length ran a wall to mark some boundry line. One by one, the children bravely clambered over the wall, but the last little one, who bore in her arms a heavy pitcher, in vain tried to follow her sisters.

A woman who had lost her child by death a short time before, was standing near, and immediately recognized the darling for whom she had been weeping so many days and nights.

Rushing forward, she clasped the child to her breast. Then the little one said: "Ah! How warm is mother's arm! But I pray thee, weep not so bitterly, else my pitcher will become heavier than I can bear! See, dear mother, how all thy tears fall into my pitcher, and how they have already wet my robe. But Lady Bertha, who kisses me and loves me tenderly, says that thou, too, shalt come to her one day, and that we shall then dwell togther in the beautiful gardens under the mountain for ever and ever.

And so, the legend tells us, the mother wept no more, but let her darling go, while from that hour she was resigned and patient, her heavy heart finding comfort in the thoughts of that happy meeting, in the "beautiful gardens under the mountain," that was sure to come.

Later, Lady Bertha had also the oversight of all spinners. On the last day of the year, which was sacred to her, and which used to be called "Punchentag" in German before the Christian rechristened it "Sylvestentag," it is said if she found any flax on the distaff she spoiled it, and in order to win her entire approval, her festival-day had to be observed with meagre fare—oatmeal porridge, or pottage and fish. Indeed, a most terrible punishment awaited all who ventured to eat anything else on that day. Lady Bertha, you see, could be very severe when she was displeased; the slightest sign of disrespect to herself was always promptly resented by this shadowy lady.

As time went on, paganism gave place to Christianity in the German fatherland, and Frau Bertha descended from her high estate of goddess, becoming little more than a terror and a bugbear to frighten children, who, by this time, were taught to think of her as a hideous being with a long iron nose and a remarkably long foot.

In France, too, the long foot played a prominent part, for the traditions of Lady Bertha are by no means confined to Germany alone. As the story goes, King Pepin fought in combat for the hand of a very beautiful maiden and accomplished spinner, Bertrada, the daughter of a Hungarian king. King Pepin having won the day and covered himself with honor, the prize was declared to be his, and the beautiful maiden, accompanied by a large suite, was sent by her father to be queen over France, while the fame of the fair lady's beauty travelled even faster than she herself. This was not strange, however, for excepting the drawback of one deformed foot, her beauty was wondrous indeed.

But it happened that a certain wicked lady of honor was not at all pleased with the choice King Pepin had made, and which she [illegible] her own ambition; so, quietly bribing some men as wicked as herself, to carry off the Lady Bertrada and slay her in the woods, she put in her place her own hideous and hateful daughter.

The fraud, you may be sure, was soon discovered, and the false queen instantly put to death by command of the royal and wrathful bridegroom.

Late one evening, when the king was riding through the woods after a long day's hunt, he came out on the banks of the river Main, in which he found a maiden diligently spinning in the pale moonlight. She was extremely beautiful, and her feet were remarkably long. Then the king gave a cry of joy, for he knew he had found the real Bertrada, alive, after all; and happy once more, he carried home to his castle his lost bride.

This Bertrada, or Bertha, was the mother of the great and famous Emperor Charlemagne, and in some [illegible] ... you will find on the walls of many French churches quaint pictures of ancient queens perfect excepting one deformed foot.

SABBATH SCHOOL MUSIC.

ADDRESS TO THE SABBATH SCHOOL CONVENTION, HELD IN MOUNT FOREST ON THE FIRST DAY OF MARCH, BY THE REV. D. M'LEOD, B. A., OF PRICEVILLE.

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen:—

I have been appointed to address you on this subject by your committee without my knowledge or consent. I made enquiries why they hit upon me, and was surprised to learn that it was because I was an old piper. It appears, then that the love for the Great War Pipes of Scotland is so deep rooted in the committee as to influence them much in their decision on the question of Sabbath School Music. While the subject is a very interesting one, is is difficult. To prepare reading matter for the young is acknowledged to be no easy task.

Doubtless, much is writen intended as reading and music for children, which is stamped with the character of

"Hi! diddle diddle,
The cat and the fiddle.
The cow jumped over the moon."

If it was intended that this state of things should continue, the committee would have selected to address on this subject one of the old fiddlers around me. But, it seems a change is desirable, and therefore' they have chosen a Highlander from a Highland congregation, taking as his model the musical instrument of the Highlanders Let us see then, what are the peculiarities of Pipe Music, and we will find what is required in our Sabbath School music,

1st.—It is simple.
2nd.—It is of convenient compass.
3rd.—It is appropriate.
4th.—It is instructive.

1. SIMPLICITY.—It is possible to make a chanter from an oat straw, upon which may be played, with accuracy, the most intricate tune within the whole range of pipe music. It is not, then, too much to ask that tunes intended for so delicate and immature an instrument as that formed by the vocal organs of a child, should be so simple that they might be sung with ease. Many tunes of such a character are to be found in the Hymn Book (Gall & Inglis) which we chiefly use, and are deservedly popular. Take for example the tune set to the words

"Jesus lover of my soul;"

Its simplicity puts it within the reach of young and old.

Many tunes, however, in this same hymn book are far from being simple: for example, the tune to the words—

"Around the throne of God in heaven
Ten thousand children stand."

In music for children the gradation from one note to the next should be easy. The time should be simple,—without demisemiquavers. Slurring—this grand sliding up and down the scale, in which professionals are expected to excel—should be avoided as much as possible. It follows, if music is to be easy.

(2) IT MUST BE WITHIN CONVENIENT COMPASS.—This is the second peculiarity which I noticed in pipe music. It is only possible to produce nine tones upon the chanter. This is one tone more than I would like to require from any ordinary child. Nothing is more hurtful to the vocal organs than to force them to strike notes which are too high or too low. Besides, singing must be disagreeable, when these organs are strained and pained. However, if we teach our children to sing let the music be of such a character that it may be performed without constraint, and without danger of injury to the frail structure which produces the voice. If we force a child to sing tunes of too high a pitch, the voice may cease to be musical, and become broken and squeaking. The first tune above mentioned is a good example of one within convenient compass. The other is fault in this respect, embracing one note more than can be played on the pipes. It goes both too high and too low.

It is plain that if a tune should be suited for the voice for which it is intended, it should also be ap-[illegible]

What kind of tunes did he give them?

[illegible]

Nobody upon hearing

"Hornpipes, jigs, strathspeys and reels,"

Could mistake them to be intended for anything else than dancing and merry-making.

Equally appropriate for the regular tramp of an armed force are all such tunes as,

"The March of the Cameron men."
"The Campbells are coming."

And

"The bonnaid bhoag bhiorach
Air Alasdair Gorm."

The marches and kindred music of the Highlands are acknowledged to be the most warlike; and some have, therefore, supposed that the pipes are only suited for military purposes. Nothing could be more erroneous. We have already noticed that the prince of dancers selected them for his grand ball. Although it was held in a church, in defiance to all sanctity, he did not use the organ.

There is a great deal of pipe music well suited for the domestic circle. Such a tune as the "Taladh," or "Nurse's Song," well played upon the pipes, would have a far happier effect upon the baby than a dose of Soothing Syrup. His sleep would come sooner and be more refreshing

But their is another class of music for which the pipes are singularly adapted and that is the LAMENT.—These were usually played at funerals. On the death of a hero, or chieftain, the very instrument that instilled his brave spirit into his followers, and inspired them to deeds of valour, during his life, gave full and true expression to their sorrow and deep grief, when they were bearing his remains to their last resting place. Sir Walter Scott mentions one of these tunes which is said to have been played before leaving home for the battle field by the McLeod's piper, McCrimmon, who had the presentiment that he never would return:—

Cha till, cha till, cha till mi tuilleadh,
Gad thilleadh Mac Leoid
Cha bheo Mac Criommoin.
Mo dhith, mo dhith, gun tri lamhan,
Da laimh's a phiob,
Is lamh's a chlaidheamh.

For this clas of music the pipes have a peculiar minor wail which thrills the soul and moves the breast. This same minor peculiarity which, when properly managed, thrills and moves the stoutest heart—with mournful sympathy, is equally well adapted to soothe and console the sorrow stricken and bereaved widow—and to lull to sleep the restless babe.

All will agree however, that a tune which is intended for a wedding should not be played at a funeral. A story is told of a young man who thought himself a piper. In the course of time his mother died. He undertook to play the Lament. The day of the funeral the solemn procession was formed. The women sat around with their shoulders rocking mournfully from side to side, according to custom; and many an

"Och,a's och, 's mo run a bhean," gave vent to theartfelt grief. Sandy blew up his pipes. He found them very hard "to tune." He screwed the drones up and down to get them to sound in harmony with the chanter. Success at last crowned his efforts, and he strikes out with the tune—

"Mo ghala chas thu
Mo ghala chas thu
Mo ghala chas 'as a fhraoch thu."

Then, waving his bonnet over his head, he shouts in triumph

"Sudie ghillean, fhuair mi leamel"

This instance shows that a would be musician may disguest and confound a whole assembly by giving music inappropriate to the occasion.

But what has all this to do with Sabbath School Music? Nothing, unless we learn something from the example of the Highland composers. If pipe music is always appropriate for the purpose for which it was intended, so should Sabbath School Music be. Surely, what is intend for the praise of God should receive as much care as what is designed for mere amusement, or some worldly object.

A child who is endowed with an ear for music, is also endowed with taste to distinguish what is appropriate from what is irrelevant or vicious.

And if his ear or taste is not improved by the tunes we teach him, it must be impaired. There are many beautiful tunes with suitable words given in our Hymn Book. Indeed the compliers have been very successful in keeping within the requirements of the Sabbath School tunes. For example the tune to the words

"One there is above all others,
O, how He loves

Beauty and simplicity, and purity of thought and sentiment, and expression, are generally combined. Tunes and hymns, partaking of the these virtues, should be taught and sung in our schools.

The very opposite qualities, however, are not unfrequently found in music and hymns intended for the "Nursery of the Church." Sometimes the beauty of the tune carries along the words with it, and gives them a popularity of which they are not worthy; sometimes the words bear the tune along; but there are others which seem to have nothing to recommend them unless it be ridiculousness. They are not fit even for Street whistling. We can imagine a Sabbath School singing the hymn beginning with the words—

[illegible]

pass fit a sing dance, others for the dance of witches in Kirk Alloway; and some are often set to words which are made to give expression to things unscriptural, nonsensical and impossible, then all this jargon is mixed up with solemn and important truths. Nothing absurd and impossible can be poetical. Where then is the poetry in

"Ring the bells of Heaven!"

The tune set to the words—

"Whosoever heareth, shout, shout the sound, is better calculated to move the "light fantastic toe" than the devotional feelings.

There is another good popular tune which is made to carry along with it words whose sentiment is heathenish,

We are waiting by the river,
We are watching on the shore,
Only waiting for the boatman,
Soon he'll come to bear us o'er, &c.

The above seems to be borrowed from Virgil's description of the Styx, which, according to heathen mythology, encircled the lower world seven times, and on its shores the souls of the departed waited their turn for the boatman Charon to ferry them across the livid waters, in his dusky boat. The souls of those whose bodies were not duly buried, were not allowed to cross for 100 years. The river has done good service for the Church of Rome, and its name is preserved in her Catechism for children. But surely it is time that all reference to it was banished from books intended for the devotional service of the young in the Presbyterian Churches.

In another very popular hymn the poor "Sailor" on life's rough sea is toldin most enlivening strains that he is "Safe in the Life boat"; and he is encouraged, or rather commanded, to "pull for the shore." He must "Heed not the rölling waves,

But bend to the oar."

But then all at once he is to

"Leave the poor old stranded wreck,
And cling to self no more."

Still he is to "pull for the shore" all the same. No wonder the poor sailor would be confused and confounded with such instruction. Virgil had the good sense to provide a ferry-man (furnished with a paddle) and a boat for the passengers; but our author would seem to deprive them of a boat and ferryman, and their own entity besides, and to leave nothing but "the oar" to "pull for the shore," and reach the other side of the "foaming billows." Such music is not edifying; it is confusing and in appropriate. The words and the music should be suited to one another, and both should be appropriate for the worship of God—the purpose for which they are intended.

The next peculiarity of our chosen instrument, is—

(4) IT IS INSTRUCTIVE.—Upon it the competent performer can express his every feeling. The silver-sounding strains, and the murmuring warblings of the Pipes of Old Scotia, have been instrumental in training a nation in deeds of bravery and valor, and also in acts of sympathy and love. Now, if our music, whether intenned for young or old, fails to lead us to one or all of these virtues, it fails in everything. The æsthetic in us, our taste for the beautiful, the sublime, and the grand—needs to be drawn out, cultivated and refined. For this purpose music is invaluable. Sabbath School music should be such as is calculated to give vent and expression to the feelings of reverence gratitude, joyfulness, humility and love, which the children are taught to entertain in the presence of HIM who knows the heart.

There is one kind of music which is too much neglected both in Sabbath Schools and congregations—namely, music in the minor mode. Many, even of those who are in the choirs, regard all minor music as hateful. Its hatefulness to them arises from one, or all, of three causes:—First—it is somewhat difficult, and they dislike the labor of acquiring a knowledge of it; Secondly—they lack the proper training to practice it successfully, thirdly; their want of cultivated taste. No music is sweeter, or more expressive of feeling than that in the minor mode. We should practice more of it in our schools, in our churches, and our homes.

In conclusion, allow me to say that our Sabbath School music should not be boisterous. The wild, rude nature will find sufficient opportunity for development outside of the class room. Let our music be such as is calculated to suppress vicious emotions, and to elevate and strengthen the nobler feelings and aspirations. Then will the remembrance of our Sabbath School music continue to send a cheering gleam all along the pathway of life, until the pearly gate opens to a briter glory.

BETWEEN 7 and 8 o'clock on Monday morning Mr. Nathan Merrick, of Thornbury, was striken down almost instantly by heart disease. He was at the time having a pleasant chat with Mr. Wm. McKinly, when he suddenly said he felt something in his throat. He was told to take a drink of water, and turned to go to his own house, and sat down on Mr. Rutherford's step, and in a moment fell over a corpse—all signs of life but a few faint gasps being extinct. Dr. Howell was sent for with speed, and the friends of the deceased could scarcely recognise the real fact when the Dr. told them Mr. Merrick was dead. The diseased was about 65 years old, and was a peaceable and honest man.—Thornbury Standard.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

DEAR SIR.—In my last letter I stated that I intended to watch and see the progress of Mormonism in our neighborhood, but since the meeting mentioned, we had only one meeting, which was on Thursday night following. As the evening was approaching, there was an appearence of trouble in the Mormon camp, from crowds of youths who assembled in the street, but by a little caution from the proprietor of the Hall, nothing serious occurred, and the Elder preached a very able discourse from Revelations, and at the close of the service he informed his hearers that he had a call to go to another neighborhood to preach "Glad tidings of the new Gospel" being restored, after being lost four years, unto the poor unbelievers; and I have only to say that some belive, so far, in his docterine that quite a few argements are held in consequence. Our neighborhood was quietly slumbering after the Mormon excitement, when we heard of a contruct of marriage made in our midst, and the boys preparing for a chivrari. I can say that our neighborhood is not bad on such unlawful gatherings, very few weddings are this way disturbed here, but in this case the groom was a widower, it not being five months since the neighborhood turned out to bury his first wife, and she being one of the most respectable young women in our place, the boys though they would chastize him a little for marrying so soon after the death of his dear and kind wife, so on the nights of Tuesday, 22nd and, Wednesday 23rd, about 40 men and boys kept the neighborhood alive by the reports of cheers, horns, guns, cow bells, &c; and at last succeded in raising the money, which was spent in whiskey, and to the amusement of some caused a few local quarrels to be stired up. What was very disgraceful in the matter, we heard of boys not over 16 years of age having been so drunk that they had to be helped home by their friends. Such gatherings I cannot approve of, as they lead on to worse, and when such practices are begun it is hard to check them. In this case, the youths were not checked by their parents as much as they should have been in making this gathering; but after due consideration, when they think of the bad habits commenced by their sons, more especially in drinking, they may wish that they had done more to stop it. Hoping, sir, that as we are drawing into the busy times now, that our neighborhood will be more quiet, so I will now bid you adieu.

ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY MILES OF PAPER.—The paper upon which THE MAIL is printed comes from the Merritton mills in immense rolls, in the web, weighing nearly 400 pounds each. From Monday morning until Saturday night 170 miles of this paper pass through the printing machines, are printed on both sides, cut, pasted, and folded ready for the carrier. This immense web of paper, if streatched across the country, would make a white streamer three feet wide reaching from Toronto to nine miles beyond Kingston, on its way to Montreal.

A MISTAKE.

It is a great and often fatal mistake to take repeated drastic purgatives for constipation of the bowles, they induce piles ond cause debility of the bowels. Burdock Blood Bitters is a safe and perfect regulator of the bowels, arousing the torpid Liver and all the secretions to a healthy action; acting on the Kidneys, and renovating and toning the system in the most perfect manner.

DIPHTHERIA is reported from nearly every quarter of the Dominion, and shattered families are its memorials wherever it appears. It is strange that a disease that has proved so deadly has not ranged more unitedly and determinedly against it the medical faculty and civil authorities. It has been conclusively proved that the proverbial ounce of prevention is of vast importente in stamping diphtheria out before it hase time to become epidemic. A medical gentleman in Nova Scotia, who has for years male a special study of the causes and prevention of the disease, and, in his practice in different parts of the Province, has had abundant field for effort in those directions, has given voluminous evidence to the public from the platform and through the press to prove that diphtheria, as well as other zymotic diseases, owes its origin to impure air and water, these caused by unclean surroundings, and its fearfully rapid spread to the unguarded approach and contact of healthy persons to and with those suffering from the disease. In one of his latest letters to the local press the doctor gives several instances in his practice where the disease in its most virulent forms had been stamped out of communities by the timely adoption of separation of the sick from the other members of the family and strict quarantine of the infected house. It is sheer blasphemy to lay to the account of Providence a scourge brought upon a community by disregard of the laws of hygiene, and let run its dire will through imprudence of the people generally and the carelessness of the authorities.

We clip the above from the Montreal Witness, and would recommend its careful perusal by our readers, and especially those in our village. What with dirty yards, filthy closets, a grave yard at our very doors, and manure heaps in our streets, the wonder is that the health of the village is as good as it is.

Do not let prejudice stand in the way of relief if you suffer from any lingering disease, Burdock Blood Bitters cure others, why should it not benefit you? It is a specific for all forms of Blood, Liver and Kidney Complaints, Nervous Headache, General Debility, Scrofula and all diseases of the Secretory system. ...

WE this week give a slight sketch of the progress of Markdale, and it is our intention, as soon as we get over the rush of the spring business, to give like sketches of the neighboring villages. Any of our friends who can forward us statistics in connection with the locality in which they live will greatly oblige us.

THE state of affairs in Ireland appears to be growing worse. A fatal encounter took place between the police and the people on the first of the month, which resulted in two men being shot dead, four or five severly injured, and about thirty others wounded. Such a state of affairs is deplorable in the extreem, and we much fear that more blood will be shed and many homes made desolate ere peace is restored to unhappy Ireland.

MARRKDALE—ITS PAST AND PRESENT.

We venture the assertion, that few places in the Dominion can boast of such rapid advancement as Markdale, during the past ten years.

Ten years ago it was nothing but a little hamlet, consisting of one or two stores, post office, a tavern, blacksmith shop and ten or fifteen private residences. To-day there are nine stores, at which you can purchase anything you require almost as cheaply as in Toronto; two tailors' shops, where you can have the outer-man adorned in a style that will compare favorably with any city in our broad Dominion; the fair sex have not been forgotten either, their wants being supplied by three first-class millinery and dress-making establishments; three grist mills, two saw mills, one steam sash, door and furniture factory, with a shingle and planing mill attached; two furniture establishments, five blacksmiths' shops, two carriage shops, two harness shops, a drug store, in which there is a branch office of the Montreal Telegraph Company and Vicker's Express, one jeweller's and watchmaker's establishment, where the Dominion Telegraph Co'y have an office; three shoe shops, three hotels, two coopers' shops, marble works, two butchers' shops, two bakers and confectioners, one hardware and tin shop, two grain elevators of 50,000 bushels capacity each, a pump factory, a law office, a good school presided over by three efficient teachers, there are four resident Ministers, a newspaper and job printing establishment, and several other branches of minor importance.

The buildings in the business portion of the Village are chiefly of brick, three stories in height, and would do [illegible] There are quite a number of [illegible] residences of brick also, which show an amount of taste and solid wealth rarely to be met with in Villages the size of Markdale, and from the quantity of building material laid down during the past winter, the progress of our stirring little Village in the future will be even greater than in the past, and promises fair, ere another decade passes over our heads, to be an incorporated town.

There are still some branches of business much needed to increase our importance and add to our material wealth, viz.:—a Foundry and Machine shop, a Woolen Factory, and a Tannery. If proper steps are taken and a little energy displayed, we see no reason why these branches should not be added to our other flourishing industries the coming season. There is no better openning in the Province of Ontario. The Village is situate in the centre of the County, and is surrounded by as fine and wealthy an agricultural district as is to be found in any portion of the country, is on the line of the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway, which will shortly be widened to the standard gauge; has unlimited water-power, and for those prefering steam, there is wood in abundance, which can be had at $1.50 (4 feet long) and upwards, per cord when purchased in quantities. There is not a foundry within seventeen miles, and if a man of the right stamp takes hold of the business, we have no hesitation in saying that an extensive and lucrative business could be done.

A tannery and woolen factory would be an equally good investment. At present the wool and hides are shipped away, one buyer alone shipping over 12,000 pounds during the past winter. We have not been able to ascertain the number of hides sent away.

So, oh! ye men of money, if you wish to place your funds where you will be sure of a speedy return on the outlay, come to Markdale. At least when you are out prospecting drop in on us, and our word for it you will go no further when you see the thrift of our people, and the signs of wealth and prosperity that surrounds us on all sides.

WE have recieved the 10th annual Report of the Ontario Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, for the fiscal year, ending 30th September, 1880. During the year, the attendance reached 284, the largest number that has at tended in any one year since the Institution was opened. Of this number 162 were males and 119 were females. From the time the institution was opened, on the 20th October, 1870 to the 30th September 1880, 498 pupils were admitted.

Some very interesting statistic respecting those 498 deaf mutes have been collected from the institution register by the superintendent. From these returns it appears that no less than 215 of those pupils were deaf mutes from birth, that in 73 cases, their deafness was caused by fevers of various kinds, in 29 by colds, in 12 by accident, in 12 by measles, in 20 by spinal disease, in 75 cases by various other causes, and in 68 cases the causes of the deafness were unknown.

The superintendent, Mr. Mathison, states that there are vacancies for several pupils in the institution, and reqnest us to try and prevail on the parents of any deaf mutes, should we know of any, to make application for their admission to the institution, and should this meet the eye of any so afflicted we trust they will make the necessary application without loss of time.

FLESHERTON.

From a Correspondent.

Mr. Richardson's chimney caught on fire at the time of the Social, and the alarm was sounded and caused quite an excitement. This is the third or forth occasion that the village has been warned out; The wolf may come some day, People should clean out their pipes and chimneys instead of burning them out.

THE Social held on the 25th March by the Flesherton Presbyterian Sabbath School, was a grand success. Dr. Sproule, M. P. called the meeting to order, after which, a lengthy Programme was disposed of. One feature in it was supply a of refreshments, and very excellent coffee, proceeds $22.00 the committie have decided to purchase an Organ, as they have suffiecnt funds on hand to pay for the same. Terrible snow storm yesterday. Vennor is right this time. While turning a large engine on the Flesherton station turntable on Wednesday 6th, and when about half turned the table gave a lurch, and the engine running forward run over the table, which is about right feet from the ground, smashing both engine and table considerably. Luckily no one was hurt much. No blame can be attached to the employees.

SUDDEN DEATH.—John McArthur, an old resident of Artemesia, near Flesherton Station, died very suddenly. He took home a grist from the mill on Wednesday evening, apparently in his usual health, and was found dead in his room on Thursday morning. He was about 70 years of age.

John Handy, about the last of the colored race in Artemesia, died after a short illness at his residence, on the Durham Road, on Wednesday morning.

An elopement which had a smack of Gretna Green about it—although, perhaps, scarcely so romantic in its details as some of the famous border marriages, but nevertheless caused considerable excitement among the friends of the parties interested, came to light yesterday.

The facts of the case are as follows; —Some time ago the affections of a certain blacksmith doing a good business in the village of Sullivan, county of Grey, became centred on the fair daughter of a well-to-do farmer, who resided in the immediate vicinity. The young lady reciprocated, but her parents refused their consent to the marriage of the lovers, on the ground that intended bridegroom was a widower; and so strong was their disapproval that they positively prohibited all intercourse between the pair. The consequence was that cladestine meetings were held, and an elopement was decided upon. The preparations for this step were made in the most deliberate manner. The blacksmith sold his shop, disposed of his business, and collected all his accounts due him; while the lady, apparently resigned to separation, went about her usual duties in the most cheerful manner possible. On Monday morning the lover after quietly sending off his trunk during the night, started on a visit to his brothers in Thornbury. Driving to Owen Sound, he took the stage to Meaford, and proceeded thence to Toronto by the Northern Railway. Stopping at St James' over night, he in the morning hunted up a couple of friends resident on Adeliade street, and together they awaited further developements. Pursuant to agreement, the lady, about five o'clock yesterday morning, packed her trunk and quickly took her departure from the domicile. She was driven by a friend to Chatsworth, took the seven o'clock train on the T., G. & B. Railway to Toronto, and before her absence was discovered was far beyond the reach of pursuit. Arriving safely in Toronto yesterday evening, she was met at the station by the friends referred to, who conducted her to St. James' where her lover was anxiously awaiting her appearance. After the four had partaken of tea together, the happy couple took the midnight train to Detroit, where they will be married upon their arrival. It is the intention of the man to go into business in Detriot, as he is possessed of some means. Both parties are highly respected and moved in the highest society in their native village.—Meaford Monitor.

BOLD ATTEMPT AT ROBBERY.

Winnipeg, March 29.—Paymaster Tims, of the Canada Pacific railway, while out at Rat Portage last week along with his assistant, Mr. Shea, paying the employees of the road was surprised by four men after night just as he was about to enter the postal car, one of whom snatched his valise, in which there was at the time $5,000 and ran down the embankment. Mr. Tims immediately drew his revolver and fired after them, but without effect, as the night was exceedingly dark, and could only see a few feet. Messrs. Tims and Shea then returned to the station and procured a lantern to make search for the thieves. The satchel was found intact, and had evidently been dropped at the first shot, the robber having apparently stumbled in his effort to get away.

GLENELG REFORM ASSOCIATION.

The Reform Association of Glenelg, met at Hall's mills, on Saturday last. Most of the leading Reformers of the Township were present, but no doubt many were absent on account of the bad state of the roads. The following efficers were elected for the year:—W. Hall, Pres.; W. Glencross, Vice Pres.; Geo. Binnie, Sec.; Chas. Moffat, Treas. An executive committee was appointed, and also delegates to central association. A draft constiution and by-laws was presented by a committee appointed at last meeting which was adopted by the association. The question of having a demonstration in the Riding was heartily endorsed by those present, and judging by the representatives, the Reformers of Glenelg, will do their share in making it a success. Matters relating to organizations were then taken up, discussed, and the best meeting ever held by the association then adjourned to meet again at the call of the President.—Review.

EUROREAN NEWS.

THE BRADLAUGH CASE.—The Court of appeals sustains the decision of the Lower Court that Mr. Bradlaugh had not the right to take an affirmation instead of the oath. Mr. Bradlaugh will appeal to the House of Lords. To night in the House of Commons Mr. Henry Labouchere, who is Mr. Bradlaugh's fellow-member for the borough of Northampton, moved for the issue of the Speaker's writ for a new election to fill vacancy caused by Mr. Bradlaugh's expulsion. The writ [illegible] so will be challenged on the ground that his conviction in the case just decided has disfranchised him and made him ineligible for a seat to sit as a member of Parliament.

F. McRae Esq., Reeve of Glenelg, entertained a few of his friends in Markdale at a supper in the Revere House, on Monday evening last. A very pleasant time was spent, the chief topic being the procuring of the proper title to what is known as the "New Road" in Glenelg leading to the village of Markdale, and the further improvement of the same,

The Weather.—Venor's snow storm was right on time and was fierce while it lasted. He also insinuates that this is the dying struggle of the winter, and that spring will be well advanced by the 15th. We sincerely hope he may be as correct in this as he was about the snow storm. Six months of steady winter inclines us to wish for a change.

A Sanitary Lesson.—The Herald's Albany special says:—A sensation was created at the hearing on the New York street cleaning bill last night when a letter from Dr Peters was read stating that for the first time in the history of New York true spotted typhus fever, which only originates where great filth abounds, had made its appearance in New York without being traced to importation. The Herald passes the severest criticism on the legislators who seek to delay the immediate passage of the street cleaning bill.

Mr. A. Spears, of Owen Sound, shipped from this station on Monday last, 9 head of young cattle, most of them about two years old whose united weight was 10,355 pounds. These cattle were bought from Messrs Campbell and Taylor, of Drumore, in the township of Proton, and were a cross between our common cattle and thorough bred Bull. This should be an inducement to our farmers, in Glenelg and Artemesia, to improve their stock. We would like to know how many head of miserable scrubs, of the same age, we have in this neighborhood, it would take to turn the scale at the above mentioned figures. Another item to be considered is, that these cattle, netted to their owners 4½ cents per pound, live weight. Friends, wake up and be moving in the matter right away, unless you wish to be left behind in the race altogether.

From a private letter received from East Liverpool, in the state of Ohio, we learn the details of a most shocking [illegible]. It appears that a man named [illegible] and family, who occupied the rear end and upper portion of a building in which there was a feed and drug store. The feed store took fire about midnight, from causes not at present known, and had made such headway ere it was discovered, that of the eleven persons in the building, only three escaped, Mr. Slone, his mother and one child. His wife, six children, and a man who attended the feed store perished in the flames. The agony of Mr. Slone was fearful to behold, and it was all the by-standers could do to prevent him from throwing himself into the burning building and trying to attempt the rescue of his wife and children. The charred remains of the unfortunate [illegible] were recovered next day, the poor mother clasping her babe to her breast.

Charivari.—On Monday night last, a number of parties collected, for the purpose of charivaring a Mr. Pritchard, of the 12th line, Euphrasia, who had returned from getting married. When opposite the house they began freely using their instruments of torture, such as bells, horns, &c., to the great anoyance of the newly married couple. He, Pritchard, called forth with a gun and went to meet them, and as soon as he got close enough to see them he fired into the crowd and peppered six of them pretty freely with shot about the head and face. One of the parties named Edward Steers, had twenty grains of it lodged in his face and head, completely disfiguring his countenance, and injuring both eyes, so that it is doubtful if he will ever have the use of them again. Dr. Sproule was summoned to attend to them, who says they are all likely soon to recover, except Steers, but of him he entertains doubts of being able to save his sight.

CANADIAN ITEMS.

Fire.—On Saturday morning last, Mr. Geo. McMullen of the 3rd concession of Sydenham, started out to Woodford with a load of hay, and on his return during the day, found that his dwelling house with contents had been totally consumed in his absence. The fire caught in the upper part of the house, supposed to be from the stovepipe, and Mrs. McMullen tried to save what she could, but was unable to get much out before the flames compelled her to retire. Mr Mullen's granary not being good, he had stored most of his grain upstairs, and it was consumed with the house. As their was no insurance, the loss will be a heavy one to him.

Mr. T. A. Brown of Collingwood has again been awarded the contract for Government supplies of cattle for the Northwest. Under the late Government all such supplies were brought in from the States, but now our own farmers have the benefit of furnishing them.

The annual meeting of the North Grey Teachers' Association will be held in Owen Sound on Wednesday and Thursday, April 13th and 14th, for which an interesting programme has been prepared. The services of Miss Lewis of Toronto have been secured for the meeting. Miss Lewis, who is a graduate of the Philadelphia School of Elocution, will give a public Entertainment in the Town Hall, under the auspices of the Association. She will be assisted by the leading amateurs of the town.

PAY THE PRINTER.

When the cold storm howls around the ho[illegible]
And you by the light of taper,
Sit closely by the evening fire,
Enjoying the last paper,
Just think of him whose work thus helps
To wear away the winter,
And put this query to yourself—
Have I paid the printer?

From east and west, from north and south,
From lands beyond the water,
He weekly brings you lots of news
From every nook and quarter;
No slave on earth toils more than he,
Through summers' heat and winter;
How can you for a moment, then,
Neglect to pay the printer?

Your other bills you promptly pay,
Wherever you do go, sir;
The butcher for his meat is paid,
For sundries is the grocer;
The tailor and the shoemaker,
The hatter and the vintner;
All get their pay—then why neglect
To settle with the printer?

CHAPTER I.

The sun was setting over a broad and gleaming Irish lake, which reflected its radiance in a thousand dimpling wavelets that formed a path of light across the water to the west. To the north lofty hills were veiling themselves in the purple mantle of evening, though here and there a bold projection caught a rosy flush from the departing orb. Trees grew down to the lake, and willows dipped their drooping braches in it. In the distance were thickly grouped woods; and scattered hamlets sent up thin lines of smoke into the air. Over all this was the glow and richness of early autumn.

Beneath a great Irish oak, the huge roots of which stretched nearly to the lake, were seated a merry paty of young people, whose voices and laughter broke pleasantly the stillness of the hour and place. Two ladies occupied the rough wooden seat that surrounded the trunk, at their feet reclined a young man in shooting costume, his gun lying near by him. Beside the elder of the young ladies stood another gentleman, a handsome distinguished-looking man, with the air of a soldier. Not far off two children were playing—a boy of about nine, a girl of six. One of the ladies was a brunette, with a warm, glowing complexion, dark large bright hazel eyes, irregular features, and a merry arch expression of face. The other—perhaps a year older—was taller, with a complexion of cream and roses, rich auburn hair, and those wonderful dark-blue eyes, with long black lashes, which are the peculiar beauty of her countrywomen; for Glorvina Desmond was an Irish girl.

She was undoubtedly as beautiful a woman as artist ever strove to depict. In repose her face had rather a sad expression, for, as her young companion seated beside her used to say, Glorvina was like an Æolian harp, responding to every air-wave that passed over her, whether grave or gay; and just now she looked anxious and sad, for the times were troubled, and she was patriotic and reflective. But when she smiled her face was brightened with a light that made it inexpressibly brilliant and bewitching, and, had she not been the heiress that she was, she would still have wielded a mighty power over men. She was very rich. Both father and mother had died in her infancy, and she had been adopted and brought up by her English mother's brother, who had died three years before and left her to guardianship of a cousin of her father, Mr. Coghlan—the owner of St. Kevin's Priory. His daughter, her devoted friend Eva, was by her side. The reclining sportsman was young Tim O'Brien, a neighbor and an old friend. The other gentleman was Captain Leicester, of the—th Hussars, which regiment, with detachments of Marines, and even to the Guards, had been sent to Ireland to endeavour to keep the land tranquil; for the Whiteboys were a source of terror, and neither life nor property was safe in the unhappy, though beautiful island.

The girls had been discussing the subject of the troubles; for danger was drawing near their own home.

"Papa," said Eva, "found a paper stuck on the hall door this morning. It had a coffin rudely drawn upon it, and told him to prepare for death, since he could find no better employment than serving the enemies of his country. It was signed 'Captain Rock.'"

"I expected they would attack him," observed Tim, "for he has been active in surpressing their meetings; and he being the magistrate who read the Riot Act before the soldiers fired at Callinarz was, of course, an unpardonable offense in their eyes."

"But it is shameful," Eva went on; "for papa is so good to his tenants and to everybody! They used to love him with all their Irish fervour before these disturbances broke out."

"And these disturbances have been created by vile political agitators," exclaimed Glorvina. "The people are a generous, hotheaded, patriotic race, and wicked men take advantage of their very virtues to lead them into peril. For my part," she added more calmly, "I think they have just cause for complaint. As a nation, we have been for centuries systematically ill used by England; but it is not by secret societies or assassinations that Ireland's wrongs can be righted. It is her deadliest enemies who suggest such a course."

"And what will Mr. Coghlan do, Miss Desmond?" asked Captain Leicester anxiously. "Will he not move his family to Dublin?"

"No I think not," she replied. "It would not do to obey the orders of such people; it would make them a hundred times worse. If one loyal gentleman were to fly at a threat, everybody would be served with one of Captain Rock's processes, and the country would be left to the Whiteboys."

"Yes. Of couse he ought not to leave; but surely, you ladies——"

"Do you think we would leave papa?" interrupted Eva indignatingly. "Not one of us would do so; would we, Glory?"

"No, indeed," responded Glorvina. "My guardian will take precautions, but we shall not leave him; indeed he treats the warning with contempt.

It is Mrs. Coghlan who has had bolts and bars put to doors hitherto ignorant of them.

"But, surely," said captain Leicester, "it would be well to have some of our fellows at the house. Would Mr. Coghlan permit me to stay there with a few men?"

"You can ask him replied Glorvina; "and we are obliged for the offer, Captain Leicester; but I don't think he will accept it." Here the children interrupted the conversation by rushing impetuously up to them, Nora exclaiming—

"Eva will you speak to Teddy and make him give up my ball?"

"Eva," exclaimed Teddy, "she gave it to me, and now she wants it back again!"

Eva laughed, and said that Nora ought not to ask to have a gift back again; but that, as she was only a little girl and he a big boy, she thought it would be more manly if he returned it.

"And I," added Eva, "will buy you a new cricket-ball at the fair next week in place of it."

"I hope my tutor will play cricket with me," said the boy, as he gave back Nora's ball to her. "Do you think he will?"

"I dare say he will," was his sister's reply.

"Is he going to have a tutor at home," asked Tim.

"Yes; mamma can't bear to part with him—after poor Dan!"—with a sigh. Little Dan Coghlan had been killed at school by an accident in the playground. "Papa has engaged a clergyman to live with us to teach Teddy."

"And the Parson is not alarmed by the possible danger of his position here?' asked Tim, laughing.

"No papa told him the country was disturbed; but of course, he knew it. He is an Irishman from Dublin University. He will not be afraid."

"I should think not!" exclaimed Teddy. "Fancy a grown-up man afraid! What would Glorvina say to that? Why, do you know, she means to marry the bravest man she can find; and I want her to wait for me?"

There was a general laugh as Teddy drew up his little figure with the air of an infant hero.

"I really think I will wait for you, Teddy," said Miss Desmond, holding out a small white hand to him; "you are such a darling!"

"Thank you, Glorvina!" cried the boy; and, turned to her, he threw his arms around her neck and kissed her. "I will make haste to grow up and deserve you!"

Glorvina, releasing herself from his embrace, rose.

"The sun is gone quite out of sight," she said. "We had better return to the house, Eva; it grows chilley now after sunset.

Miss Coghlan complied with her request, and they turned homeward, Captain Leicesters by Eva's side, and Tim O'Brien by Miss Desmond's.

"And so" he said to her, as they walked a little in advance of the others, "you mean only to wed a hero, Miss Glorvina? I'm thinking I would take service under King George, if it would give me a chance of winning you!"

"Being a soldier does not necessarily make a man a hero," she replied laughing.

"But it gives him an opportunity of showing if he's one or not! Tell me, should I have a chance with you if I wore Leicester's fine feathers?"

"Not any," she replied firmly, though kindly. "If you had achieved feats worthy of the Round Table I could not love you, Mr O'Brien. Pleaselet us not return to this subject; it is useless, and disagreeable!"

A frown rested on Tim O'Brien's face.

"I never give up anything I have resolved to have," And in spite of yourself, I will win you yet, Glorvina!"

Looking greatly annoyed, Miss Desmond drew up her stately figure, turned suddenly back to her companions, and joined them with some slight remarks about the evening; then taking Teddy's little hands into hers, she walked beside them on the grass, and gave Mr. O'Brian no further opportunity of pressing a suit hehad obstruded on her for some time past in vain. In truth, Glorvina; was more than indifferent to Tim O'Brien; she disliked him instinctively, though he was a great favorite with all the Coghlan family, and was treated as a son of the house. She had a distrust of him for which she could scarcely account, unless it was for her belief in physiognomy, which told her that Tim's very handsome face bore nevertheless the impress of a crafty nature.

On their return to the house, they found tea ready for them, and Mrs. Coghlan seated before the urn. She was a very pretty woman, still in the flower of her age. Her husband, who stood near the window, was many years older, and slightly lame. Tim O'Brien was cordially greeted by both, and Captain Leicester by the host, who had been out of doors when the young soldier called in the afternoon and walked with the young ladies to the lake.

"I saw your father, Tim" said Mr. Coghlan, as they sat at their meal, "I find that he also had a missive from Captain Rock—confound him!"

"Oh, sir, you never told us of it!"

"I did not know it till this minute," replied Tim, a dark flush spreading over his face; "but I suppose all the gentlemen are in for the same."

"What is Mr. O'Brien going to do?" asked Mrs. Coghlan, a little anxiously.

"He did as I did," replied her husband—"exhibited his precious epistle to the bench to-day; and more troops will be sent for; but I don't see that they are really required. I think we make to much of those threats.

"But they have been awfully fulfilled in the case of poor Brown and L'Estrange," said Captain Leicester gravely, naming two agents who had been recently shot.

"That is true, and it is a disgrace to the country. But they were Englishmen and were extremely severe on the tenants. All who have been threatened have not actually suffered. Certainly neither O'Brien nor I will be scared away from our homes."

"Was the warning to my father exactely like your own?" asked Tim O'Brien, still looking anxious."

"Not quite!" laughed Mr. Coghlan. "He is to be spared and protected if he will deposit one hundred pounds for the good of the cause' under the great stone near Creightown village."

"And will he do so?" asked Tim with eagerness.

"Of course not! There is no fear of O'Brien's paying the blackmail to the rebels. But it is a new idea—the only warning with such a clause in it."

"If it would save him and mother from danger, I think he had better pay it said Tim.

"My dear boy, it would be treason to do so! No, no! If we treat their menaces with contempt, the rascels will soon give up their foolish attempt to frightening us."

"I am not sure that they are mere threats," persisted Captain Leicester; "and I was saying just now, Mr. Coghlan, that I should be happy to bring some of our men here and remain for a few days till we see if any attempt is made to carry out their threats.

"We are very much obliged for your kind offer," replied Mr. Coghlan; "but we could not think of troubling you Your presence would be acknoledgment of fear on our part. Besides, remember how near the barracks are to us. Why you must be able to hear our alarum-bell if we rang it; it can be heard in the village close to you!"

"Then pray ring it at the slightest alarm!" said the soldier. "We are always on the watch now, keep in barracks, and ready at a minute's notice to go anywhere."

Then the conversation took another and more lively turn; and, when tea was over, the two young men departed. Captain Leicester had to be early in barracks, and Tim O'Brien declared that he thougt it would be prudent to accompany him so far.

"For" he added "I have my gun, you know, if we should be interrupted."

"And I," said Leicester,, with a quiet smile, "have pistols."

As the two young men passed the lodge gates, the young officer glanced back rather uneasily.

LOVE WITHOUT NONSENSE.

About two months ago a young woman entered an office in Justice Alley and took a seat without speaking to any one, and it was only after 2 long hours had dragged away that his Honor inquired what he could do for her.

"I want to get married," was her prompt reply.

"To whom?"

"To the fellow who has been waiting on me."

"Where is he?"

"I don't know. He agreed to be here long ago, but I shant' wait any longer. We'll come in some time during the week."

In about ten days she appeared with a white haired William on her arm and said they were ready to be married, but just then a fire alarm was turned in and away went the lover at the top of his pace to see the fun. As he did not return in the course of an hour the girl said she guessed they'd postpone the marriage to another day. On the fourth day after, the pair once more entered the office but a law suit was in progress. They sat together, hands clasped and eyes full of love, while the lawyers abused each other, but after the case had hung out till about dusk they got discouraged and went out, the girl saying to his honor:

"Never mind—some other day will do as well."

"But don't get discouraged?"

"Oh no. We simply thought we'd get married, but there is no cause for any rush about it."

Three days elapsed, and his Honor sat looking into the bowl of his pipe when the pair opened the door, walked in and removed their hats, and the woman said:

"If you haven't got anything to do just now you may marry us, and I'll get back to my sweeping and dusting."

The cermony was speedily begun and concluded, and the bride turned to resume her shawl with the rmark:

"William, I'll pay the fee, and you can hand it to me sometime during the month," and she took out a wallet.

"All right, Mary. I'll be over and see you the last of the week."

"Very well—go 'long, William."

She paid the fee, waited for a certificate, and went out with the remark:

"Excuse the bother, sir, but we did think it best to marry, and I'm sure we're quite obliged to you in addition."—Detroit Free Press.

WHERE IS YOUR BOY TO-NIGHT.

Life is teeming with evil snares,
The gates of sin are wide,
The rosy fingers of pleasure wave
And beckon the young aside.
Man of the world, with open purse
Seeking your own delight,
Pause! ere reason is wholly gone—
Where is your boy to-night?

Sirens are singing on every hand,
Luring the ear of youth,
Gilded falsehood with silver notes
Drowneth the voice of Truth,
Dainty lady in costly robes,
Your parlors gleam with light,
Fate and beauty your senses steep—
Where is your boy to-night?

Tempting whispers of royal spoil
Flatter the youthful soul
Eagerly entering into life,
Restive of all control.
Needs are many, and duties stern
Crowd on the weary sight,
Father, burried in business cares,
Where is your boy to-night?

Pitfalls lurk in the flowery ways,
Vice hath a golden gate,
Who shall guide the unwary feet
Into the highway straight?
Patient worker with willing hand,
Keeping the home hearth bright,
Tired mother, with tender eyes,
Where is your boy to-night?

Turn his feet from the evil paths,
Ere they have entered in,
Keep him unspotted while yet he may,
Earth is so stained with sin.
Ere he has learned to follow wrong,
Teach him to love the right,
Watch, ere watching is wholly vain—
Where is your boy to-night?

IN THE MIDST OF PERIL.

By the Author of "Hidden Quicksands," "A Relentless Foe," "Maggie O'Connor's Fortunes," &c., &c.

"I hope we may not hear the alarum bell to-night," he said. "I can't get over an uncomfortable foreboding about the family. Coghlan is to confident. Did you notice that the shutters were not even closed when we left? Any one out side would be able, with the lights inside, to see all over the room. And they have only two men-servants in the house—that old butler and a mere lad. I shall advise Coghlan to hire another man—a good strong fellow."

"Better not," replied Tim curtly. "Those who he has are trustworthy, both of them. A stranger might let in the White-boys."

"Hilloa!" exclaimed the officer, stopping short. "What is that in the copse?"

Tim turned and just distinguished a gleam of white disappear behind the trees at the side of the road.

"Bridget Mahoney's white cow," he said, laying his hand on Leicester's arm as he was raising his pistol. Nothing worse I assure you. I have often seen the creature here. I saw her as I walked past to-day."

The young soldier dropped his arm.

"I hope you are right," he answered doubtfully; "but I thought it resembled a human figure."

"Not a bit of it," declared Tim; "only everybody nowadays has White boys on the brain."

There was a tinge of sarcasm in his tone, and Captain Leicester looked around at him sharply. But Tim had no sneer on his lip; on the contrary, he looked grave and even troubled, and his companion turned away in silence.

At the barracks gate they parted company. Captain Lecister did not invite him to go in and spend the evening with him; and young O'Brien a little disappointed—for he corted the military—walked on, muttering to hinself—

"A coneited ass! I wonder if it is the heiresss he's after? But of course it is! Money and beauty united most always win the day against mere prettiness and a small portion, such as Eva has! But he shall never have Glorvina—by Heaven!"

CHAPTER II.

The alarum from St. Kevin's did not call out the military that night or the following one, and the household began to forget their uneasiness. Mr. and Mrs. Coghlan and Eva went into town on the morning of the second day after receiving the warning; the father on business and also to bring back the expected tutor; the lady on the plea of shopping, but, in reality, because they both had an unspoken dread of loosing sight of the beloved husband and father. Glorvina would doubtless have gone also, had she not yielded to Mrs. Coghlan's entreaty that she would stay at home and take care of the children. The mother would thus be relieved of one part of her anxiety; for people were beginning to dread a repetition of the atrocities which had disgraced the rebelion begun by Lord Edward Fitzgerlad and persued after his death with revolting cruelty.

Glorvina had the children with her all day, and, weary at last, had left them with the nurse, when she heard the sound of wheels in the avenue; and, thinking the family had returned, ran to her room to smooth her hair, disorded in romping with the little ones, and then descended to the drawing-room, confirmed in her idea by seeing a pile of luggage at one end of the hall.

On throwing open the door she was startled to find, not the Coghlans, but a stranger standing in the room. He turned as the door opened, and she precieved that he was a slight, pale young man, wearing spectacles and the dress of a clergyman. He was not more than five feet eight in hight, and a stoop—caused probably by habitual bending over books—rather detraced from his stature. Glorvina guessed at once that this was Teddy's new tutor, and she advanced to greet the stranger, who looked shy and frightened, she thought, as he precieved her,

"You are Mr. Surridge, I believe?" she said, smiling. "Allow me to introduce myself to you as Glorvina Desmond—Mr. Coghlan's ward. I suppose you have somehow missed Mr. Coghlan, since you have arrived here before him. He and Mrs. Coghlan went into town to day, partly with the intention of meeting your coach and bringing you back with them."

"Mr. Coghlan told me of his intent to do so," replied the stranger, with a shy, diffident air, "and I waited for some time—an hour at least—at the inn. Then the Landlord told me that possibly, owening to the state of the country, Mr. Coghlan might be prevented from coming to town; so I thought it better to go on. I hired a car, and came here. But"—pausing a little—"a rather alarming incident occured on the way. My driver sang rebel songs—chiefly 'Shan Van Voght'—the whole way we came, whispering to me once that he did it for protection. At last we meet four men. One addressing my driver, asked if he had seen Pat Malone in the town that day. He answered, 'No; he ain't seen, and he's not a-coming to-day, I hear.' The fellow who had spoken muttered an imprecation and turned away. My driver lashed his horses; then, turned to me, said, 'The Virgin forgive me for that lie! If they find it out it's my life that will pay for it!' I asked, 'Did they mean any harm to this Patrick Malone?' His only answer was a whistle. But I am certain those men were on an evil errand. Do you now of any Patrick Malone in this neighborhood, Miss Desmond?"

Glorvina turned very pale.

"My guardian's name is Patrick Malone Coghlan," she said, "and he has reciently recieved a warning from Captain Rock."

The young man looked very grave

"Then probably he owes his life today to my car driver," he said. "This is an awful state of things!"

"It is indeed," agreed Glorvina "But pray sit down, Mr. Surridge; I trust my guardian will soon be home."

Glorvina seated herself, and then came a singular pause. The moment the subject which had interested and excited him ceased being discussed the stranger became even more shy than he had been on Glorvina's entrance. He looked away from her, answered her remarks and questions in in a confused manner, and was evidently thoroughly uncomfortable. Glorvina, accustomed to the bold self-assertion and assurance of their young Irish neighbours, was surprised and a little amused at his shyness. Yet the student who moved his hands so nervously and looked so bashfully away from her was unmistakably a gentleman. His face was refined and intellectual, though not handsome, and his voice sweet, with the tone of cultivation in it. Would her riotous child-lover Teddy ever obey one whose manner was so timid and diffident? She feared not. But other and heavier fears were busy at her heart. The day was fast waning, and the Coghlang had not returned.

She was beginning to express her anxiety about them when she heard again the sound of wheels, and, going to the window, saw, with glad thankfulness, her friends safely returned. She ran into the hall to meet them, and to tell them that the tutor had arrived.

"Tiresome fellow?" exclamed Mr. Coghlan. "We have been waiting for him this hour! We sent the boy up to the inn to ask him if he would come to us at Doctor Delayne's. He sent back word that he would be with us as soon as he had found his luggage, which he had lost, if we would be kind enough to wait on him. We waited till we were weary, but he never came. I did not think it right for Eva and her mother to be out any later; so we sent word that he was to follow us, and at last set out for home!"

"How extraordinary!" exclaimed Glorvina. "He certainly never recieved any message. He told me that he had waited an hour for some tidings of you, and then Kavanagh presuaded him to go on in a car."

Kavanagh is the hotel keeper.

"But the boy told me that it was Kavanagh who gave him the message!" declared Mr. Coghlan.

"It is some blunder," said his wife curious to see their new inmate. "Come in and speak to Mr. Surridge." And, entering the drawing-room, followed by the two girls, they gave the tutor a cordial greeting.

He heard with shy amazement of the message which he had neither received nor sent, and no little wonder was excited by the incident.

"Could it be," diffidently suggested the new tutor, "that the landlord had purposely delayed Mr. Coghlan, knowing that he would be waylaid?"

And then he repeated the story of the car-driver's conduct.

Mrs. Coghlan turned pale and grasped her daughter's hand; the father looked grave and puzzled.

"It might be so," he said slowly; "for no one knows who is really in league with the White boys, and Kavanagh, the landlord of 'The Shamrock,' owes me a good turn ceartainly Well your lives are in heaven's hands."

"But you shall not drive into town again for a manylong day!" exclaimed his wife vehemently.

"There will be no need for some time," he replied. "I have secured a good sum from the bank, and you have laid in provisions for a seige."

"That is pleasant to know," said a rich voice at the open door, and, turning in surprise, they saw Tim O'Brien standing there. "How are you all?" he added, advancing. I found Connors at the hall door getting in packages, so I came in unannounced."

"Glad to see you," said Mr. Coghlan, shaking hands. "We have just returned from town, as you perceive. Sit down, my good fellow, and you shall have dinner soon. It is much after the usual time."

"Well, I won't refuse, for I got but a snack at Biddy Latouche's as I came along."

"Mr. Surridge," said their host, turning to the tutor, "will you allow me to show you to your room? Murphy will have taken your luggage to it by this time."

The words directed O'Brien's attention to the clergyman; he turned and looked at him with a cool impertinence which was peculiar to Tim; and Glorvina noticed that, though the tutor flushed as he met that gaze, he returned it steadily and with dignity; then he left the room with his host.

Glorvina, not wishing to be alone with O'Brien, put her arm around Eva and went up-stairs with her to help her to remove her walking dress. Little Norah met them at the top of the stairs, and kissing Eva, who ran by her side into her bedroom.

"So that is the new tutor!" exclaimed Eva. "Teddy will never mind him! He looked frightened to death when we spoke to him."

"I am afraid Teddy will lead him a life!" responded Glorvina, laughing. "He is so shy! He put me in mind of Marlow in dear Goldsmith's play of 'She Stoops to Conquer' when he had his first interview with Miss Hardcastle. After one wild stare at me, he never looked into my face again; and after telling me, with eager excitement, of the car-driver's words, he grew so confused that I could make nothing of his sentences."

"Oh, I remember Marlow!" said Eva, laughing. "We saw the play acted in Dublin. A fellow who could not say 'bo to a goose,' but came out all right at the end. But it is provoking of uncle Alfred to send such a man to teach Teddy. Ted will never mind him. Ted does not even mind Tim O'Brien. And uncle Alfred said this man was such a wonderful and so learned!"—disappointedly.

"That may be quite true dear. He is probably totally unused to the society of ladies. He has wasted all his life at Trinity, depend upon it. But Teddy would have better appreciated a sportsman than a bookman."

"And so would mamma and I," replied Eva. "Mamma has been saying what a protection a strong young man—a gentleman too—would be in the house to defend papa in case of real danger. But this poor man—why, a breath of air would blow him away like a puff of thistle-down! A fine protector, truly!"

The dinner bell—unusually late that day—interrupted their chat, to which Norah had listened intently, resolving to confide it at once to Teddy as she did shortly afterwards, to that young gentleman's profound disgust.

"A fellow like that to come to teach me!" he exclaimed indignatly. "I'll teach him, Norah, you may depend!" And hereupon Master Teddy began to devise a trick which was to have much more important results than he dreamed of.

All unconsious of the designs against him, the tutor had meanwhile made his simple toilet, and descended to the drawing-room. Dinner was served soon afterwards; and James Surridge, a silent, or nearly silent, observer, perceived with satisfaction that the family of his employer were corteous, pleasant, and refined people with whom it would be easy to get on.

"O'Brien," said Mr. Coghlan, as the soup was removed, "have you heard of Captain Rock's disclaimer of your father's warning?"

"No, sir," replied Tim.

"Well, a paper has been affixed in the market place, signed by Captain Rock and declaring, 'on the honor of an Irish gentleman,' that Mr. O'Brien's warning never came from him, and that it is for the rights of Ireland and not for the 'dirty gunieas' they are 'up.'"

"Oh, I am glad!" exclaimed Glorvina. "It is such a shameful come down from their pretensions. They may be rebels; but they are not thieves."

"My dear," said Mr. Coghlan gravely, "surely you do not rank assassination beneath theft—I mean as a crime of less magnitude?"

"Oh, no," replied Glovina, "of course not! But still——"

"No, no, child," interrupted her guardian, "don't excuse them. They ought to come forth openly and fight for what they deem their rights like men, not shoot down unoffending people from behind hedges."

"Yes, indeed!" sighed the girl. It gave her a bitter pang that her countrymen should thus belie their manhood.

There was much discussion as to the new tutor when the ladies returned alone to the drawing-room. Mrs. Coghlan highly appoved of him.

"A gentlemanly modest young man," she said, secretly rejoiced that the new inmate of their house was so little attractive; for the sole objection she had made to a resident tutor was that Eva might fall in love with him.

"And she is not rich enough to a poor man," she had declared to her husband, "since the place is entailed on Teddy."

A RAILROAD DEPOT BURNED.

LOSS TWENTY THOUSAND DOLLARS.

A fire broke out at midnight, on March 30th, in the freight warehouse of the Quebec, Montreal, and Ottawa railway at Hochelaga, just outside the city limits. There being little water available and only one engine at hand the flames spread with frightful rapidity until they had a full grasp of the entire building. A quantity of powder which was stored within exploded and consummated the work of destruction. The fire spread to the passenger depot, which it soon reduced to ashes. An employee of of the railway had a narrow escape from being burned to death, and owes his life to the firemen from the east end, who hastended to the scene, but could do nothing to quell the flames owing to the want of water. The origin of the fire is unknown at present. The loss cannot be definitely estimated, but is thought to exceed twenty thousand dollars, including the goods that were in the warehouse. Both the passenger and freight depots were of wood.

A man named Phileas Prevost was killed near the depot when the fire broke out, by an engine running over him he was attempting to cross the line. Mr. Payette, who was rescued by the firemen, ... severely injured.

We learn, as we go to press, that the Scott Act was defeated in Hamilton yesterday, by a majority of 1,200.

ADVICES from England state that the health of Lord Beaconsfield is in a very critical condition, and that very slight hopes are entertained of his recovery.

LAST week's issue of the STANDARD contained a supplement presented to our readers by the well known firm of T. Milburn & Co., Toronto. The various preparations of their house have long been staple productions in the market, and their medicines, to our especial knowledge, have gained a well-deserved popularity. Their latest production is a Tonic and Blood and System Renovating Compound, known as "Burdock Block Bitters." Most of our readers are familiar with the medicinal virtues of that common pasture weed Burdock, and many a matron is wont to resort to its healing virtues, and many a cure has been performed in a simple manner when medical sience and skill have been baffled. We are informed that during the past year there has been gathered a large supply of this root alone, affording the diggers a handsome remuneration. Many other roots, herbs and barks are likewise gathered, and the hands engaged in the manufacture of Burdock Blood Bitters are pushed to their utmost in preparing this compound for the trade. Although we learn that the remedy has been scarcely a year before the public yet the demand already exceeds the supply, but the proprietors now inform us that their facilities are perfected for any emergency. However prejudiced any may be to the use of a patent medicine, when one sees the number of testimonials that have been published they must be forced to acknowledge such marked evidence of its curative properties that they can only wonder why any should be sceptical. We would ask the particular attention of our readers to the advertisement, assuring them that whatever is claimed by the proprietors of this remedy may be implicitly relied upon. The season of biliary complaints and blood diseases is now approaching and we advise the afflicted to test the virtues of Burdock Blood Bitters.

We notice that the streets in front of Noble's blacksmith shop, Mansion House and Reynolds & Son store has been scraped, and the winter's accumulation of dirt drawn into heaps for removal. This is a move in the right direction, and an example which some others in our village might follow. In fact it is an imperative necessity if the health of the village is of any importance to our people. The cleaning of the streets, however, is not all that is necessary, the yards, outhouses and cellars require to be attended to, and that right soon. The warm weather is now rapidly approaching, and if the accumulated filth and dirt that may be seen in all directions is left to be acted on by the daily increasing heat of the sun the miasma arrising there from will carry death and desolation into every house in the village.

We regret to have to use such strong language, but we think the occasion calls for it. We cannot look camly on and see the health of the little ones jeopardised without having our word to say in their defence. There are two streets in our village the equal of which we do not believe can be found in any other place in the Dominion, we allude to Elizabeth and Queen streets. Our citizens need never hope to see much of an addition to our population, unless better sanitary measures are adopted.

We hope oureaders will take these remarks in the spirit they are meant, and act on them. By so doing they may save themselves a good deal of bitter sorrow in the future.

PRICEVILLE.

Correspondence to the STANDARD.

We held our quarterly examination in the public School of School Section No. 7, Artemesia, on Friday, April 1st, and are sorry to say there was a poor attendance of the ratepayers. It is astonishing how little interest parents take in the progress of their children. The Trustees were greatly pleased with the success of the Teacher's efforts in imparting instruction, and the aptness with which the scholars answered all questions put. One of them remarked the good feeling existing between the Teacher and the Scholars. This school was very near depopulated during nine months of last year in consequence of the fever raging in Priceville and vicinity, though we are glad to say only one case proved fatal in this section. There is some prospect of a school house here to take the place of the substantial though rustic log one, which is falling behind the times, in consequence of the rapid stride education is making in our day.

It is astonishing how good the sleighing keeps on the back roads, and it so late in the season; there is fully six feet of snow some places around here on the roads yet.

[This should have appeared last week but was crowded out.]

HOLLAND CENTRE

From a Correspondent.

A certain young man of this community has been growing up for more than eighteen summers, but strange to say he has of late taken suddenly to growing down—the down is especially to be seen on his upper lip.

One of our enterprising young men was led as a victim to the matrimonial altar, on Wednesday last. We wish him success. Mr. Sheins another of our foremost young men is preparing to build a beautiful residence on Front Street. What is to follow that your correspondent sayeth not.

Several of our mechanics are about to leave for fairer climes. Some are going to the "Great Lone Land", and one to the presuming Markdate.

On the 29th ult., the annual Missionary meeting was held in the Methodist Church here. There was a good meeting, the Rev Mr McDiarmid, of your town was the chief speaker.

The mud is not so deep here as when the young man lived, who said, "It is a mistake, the centre of the earth is not a mass of fire it is only mud."

Mr Alfred Williams is building a steam Saw Mill at Berkeley.

The hens about here are doing their duty for Easter.

NOTICE.—We wish it disinctly understood, that we do not hold ourselves reponsible for the opinions expressed by our correspondents.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

SIR,—Will you be kind enough to give space in you valuable paper to to the following remarks, having saw some of your correspondents in your issue of the 7th of April, about the greater want felt in Markdale, of a woolen factory. The writer has run a custom woolen mill at the village of Markdale during the past seven years and intends to run it this season. Now if the people of this place feel the want of a one set factory, let them subscribe one thousand dollars bonus to the undersigned and I will give a guarantee to put in the necessary machinery and run the factory, and thus would give this merchant you speak of who bought such a large amount of wool, an opportunity to get it made into cloth, and thereby employ a number of hands, and keep the capital floting in the village for the benefit of all parties. Why not give the preference to the man who has spent twenty-three years amongst you and bore the burden in the heat of the day.

While I remain yours, a lover of justice and truth,

W. P. RITCHIE.

Markdale, April 9th, 1881.

[We do not think the village is inclined to the giving of bonuses, but we do think there are advantages which would warrant a good live business man to invest capital in any of the manufacturing lines which we mentioned last week and they are open to all.—ED. STANDARD.]

The election for reeve of Collingwood to fill the place of Mr. Hogg, disqualified, took place on Saturday. Mr. Moberly was elected by a majority of 171.

A ROUGH TIME

EXPERIENCE OF SETTLERS IN DAKOTA.

From the Boston Globe.

A story told by Joseph Sterrette, of Big Lake, Dakota, who has just managed to break through the terrible snow blockade in that section of the country, gives only a fair statement of the troubles experienced by the settlers during the severe winter. Mr. Sterrette pre-empted 160 acres of farm land in Big Lake two years ago, and at once moved on it with the family and settled down to work. At the end of the year he was in shape for farming, and had a comfortable cabin. He laid in the quantity of fuel and prepared for winter, but it proved more severe than he or his neighbors had calculated. In fact Sterrette's better preparations for the rigour of the season turned out to be the only means which prevented himself, family, and several neighbors from starving and freezing to death. In February he found it necessary to rescue the entire families of two neighboring farmers, not so well housed, from perishing by cold, by taking them into his own house. The cold was so steady and so bitter that before the season was half over the fuel which he had gathered to last until spring was all consumed. Then he and the men staying with him went out and took down the fences and out houses and burned them. The heavy snow fall, which at this time blockaded the railways, was piled in such drifts about the house were Sterrette and his neighbors were domociled as to absolutely cut off all communication with the outside world. The mercury fell lower than ever; the winds grew fiercer, and the surrounding snow caked and solidified. At this time they dug their way—or rather mined it—through the blockade to the railway near by, and dug out ties which they chopped up, took home, and burned to cook their scanty food and save their wives and children from freezing. When the ties and telegraph poles that could be reached were consumed, it was decided to dig through to the cabins of those sheltered in Sterrett's house and break them up for fuel. This was done. The bitter cold still continued Sterrett's furniture was next sacrificed even to the beadsteads, trunks, and children's toys. While the cold imprisoned pioneer's were upon this last supply of fuel a consultation was held and it was decided to make a desperate attempt to drive through the deadly blast on the crust for relief. John Becker agreed to go. A sleigh was prepared, and five horses hitched to it, Becker started. It was a terrible undertaking, and when the brave man left there were tears frozen upon his cheeks. Becker persisted in taking a fine shepherd dog. He gave as his reason;—"I don't know what may happen; I would rather bury Carlo in my belly than have him freeze to death." Sterrette and his companions became alarmed when at the end of two days Becker did not return, and they started out for him. They had not gone far when they came across a hole in the drift where Becker had broken through. The man was found curled up in the sleigh frozen dead. His faithful dog was lying huddled up against his breast dead. The five horses were standing lifeless on their feet, all frozen stiff. The men carried Becker's body back, made a coffin of the sleigh, nailed the corpse up in it, and then revently placed it in a corn crib until the weather should permit of its burial. Soon after this, and just as the party was on the point of despair, the weather moderated sufficently to break the snow blockade, and Sterrette and friends found relief. A neighboring family during this time had no other food than soup made from an ox-pelt which happened to be in the house when the blockade began.

AVIRAGO'S HIGH JINKS.

A well dressed woman by the name of Margaret Hogg, claiming to be a sister of Martin Hogg, of Harriston, arrived there from Leadville, Colorado, on Thursday, April 7th, remaining over night and next day. She undertook to view the town, and in doing so partook of an occasional drink until she became rather under the influence of liquor. While looking around the market she came in contact with a couple of men, when a conversation took place, which ended in a quarel, and the woman knocked and kicked both men out of time in short order. From this she proceeded to one of the hotels and while one James Close was trying to make a trade of some kind in the bar-room she approached, and making her brag of having killed several men in Leadville she tried her skill on Close. Drawing from her pocket a revolver she pulled the trigger twice, but the weapon did not go off. Close asked the hotel-keeper if the pistol was loaded. He replied "no," and that she had pointed it at him several times during the day, and it never went off. The woman then snapped the pistol again, when it went off, the ball just grazing and burning the cheek of Close. She then retired and took the after noon train which was due and left for Paisley. A message was at once sent to Paisley for her arrest, and she was brought back here on Saturday morning, when she was brought before the mayor, convicted and sent down for trial. Next morning while in charge of the constable she asked for a few minutes leave, which was granted, and she left and has not been heard of since. The constables are in hot persuit after her, but have not overhauled her yet. She is a large manly loooking woman, with plenty of money, and seems to be putting in a good time generally.

LATER.—The woman Hogg has been captured at Clifford and will be brought back here this evening, when she will likely be more closely looked after.

THE OKA INDIANS.

A SCHEME FOR THEIR REMOVAL TO ONTARIO

It is understood that arrangements have been made for the transfer of the Oka Indians at Two Mountains to another section. During the present week Mr. Choquet, representing the Seminary authorities, and Mr. McGirr, agent of the Indians, where at Toronto interviewing the Ontario Government in relation to the purchase of a tract of land for a reserve. Ten thousand acres were arranged for in the Parry Sound district. It is said the price to be paid is 50 cents an acre. The Seminary St. Sulpice are to pay for the land, and also the cost of removing the Indians to the new reservation, which has yet to be selected. Yesterday afternoon Messrs. McGirr and Choquet had an interview with the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, who is to manage the business now under way, in the presence of Chief John Tavishe and Ignace Altonie, two of the Oka tribe, when matters were agreeably arranged. Mr. Choquet left for home last evening. Mr. McGirr saw Mr. Vankoughnet again to-day, and left for Oka with the Indians to-day. The land about to be purchased will be selected without delay, and the removal of the Indians begin at an early day. The carrying out of the present arrangements will thus finally settle the long pending Oka Indian troubles.

DEATH FROM POISONING.—News comes from Tara of the death from poisoning on Wednesday of last week of Mr. Samuel Muir, a well known resident of the village. His wife died about three months ago, after a lingering illness, and he lived alone since that time. It is not known whether the poisoning was accidental or intentional. Another family living in the same house heard his cries, and when the door had been forced open, found him beyond medical aid, expiring in a few minutes afterward.—O. S. Times.

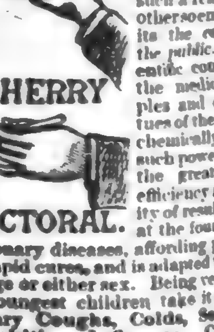
THE BEST RE...

FOR

Diseases of the Throat and Lu...

AYER'S



CHERRY

PECTORAL.

In diseases of the pulmonary organs a safe and reliable remedy is invaluable. AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL is such a remedy, and no other so eminently merits the confidence of the public. It is a scientific combination of the medicinal principles and curative virtues of the finest drugs, chemically united, of such power as to insure the greatest possible efficiency and uniformity of results. It strikes at the foundation of all pulmonary diseases, affording prompt relief and rapid cures, and is adapted to patients of any age or either sex. Being very palatable, the youngest children take it readily. In ordinary Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Bronchitis, Influenza, Clergyman's Sore Throat, Asthma, Croup, and Catarrh, the effects of AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL are magical, and multitudes are annually preserved from serious illness by its timely and faithful use. It should be kept at hand in every household for the protection it affords in sudden attacks. In Whooping-cough and Consumption there is no other remedy so efficacious, soothing, and helpful.

Low prices are inducements to try the many mixtures, or syrups, made of cheap and ineffective ingredients, now offered, which, as they contain no curative qualities, can afford only temporary relief, and are sure to deceive and disappoint the patient. Diseases of the throat and lungs demand active and effective treatment; and it is dangerous experimenting with unknown and cheap medicines, from the great liability that these diseases may, while so trifled with, become deeply seated or incurable. Use AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL, and you may confidently expect the best results. It is a standard medical preparation, of known and acknowledged curative power, and is as cheap as its careful preparation and fine ingredients will allow. Eminent physicians, knowing its composition, prescribe it in their practice. The test of half a century has proven its absolute certainty to cure all pulmonary complaints not already beyond the reach of human aid.

WE were in Mr. Bradley's Mill, Flesherton, last week, and judging from appearances he is doing a rushing business. He has a good stock of logs in for his saw mill, and is doing a good gristing business. From our short acquaintance of Mr. B. he is worthy of sucess.

THE snow is rapidly disappearing, and the roads are anything but pleasant to travel on. Some of our exchanges speak of having seen robins and other harbingers of spring, but as yet we have not been visited by anything of that kind in this locality.

JOHN HOPKINSON, Auctioneer, has received instructions from James Graham, lot 16, con. 12, township of Proton, to sell without reserve, on Tuesday April 16th, all of his farm stock, implements &c. All sums under $5 cash over that amount 9 months credit on furninshing satisfactory paper.

To ascertain if a man is energetic and pushing, and keeping up with the times, you have only to look in your local paper and see how much space he occupies in its advertising columns. That McFarland is one of the right stamp is evident from the fact that he is no niggard in this respect. See his advertisement in another column.

GENERAL ITEMS.

It is now proposed that the New-York World's Fair be put off until 1892, the anniversary of the discovery of America by Columbus.

During the six years between 1870 and 1876 there were 63,442 persons exiled to Siberia by the Government of the late Czar.

A FACT.—It is a fact that Ireland spends yearly on intoxicating drinks about fifty million dollars, enough to buy out all the landlords and obivate the necessity of paying rent. Some of the Irish prefer to drink the whiskey and shoot the landlords.

FOUND DEAD.—A man named James Kennedy residing about a mile and a half from Durham, in Bentick, was found dead in his bed this morning. We understand that an inquest will be held this afternoon.—Review.

ACCIDENT.—One day last week, as a brakesman named Ryan, was coupling cars at the T.G. & B. Railway station his head was caught between the couplings and recieved a slight squeeze. If the couplings had come together an inch further than they did, instant death would have been the result.—Orangville Gazette.

A LITTLE ten-year-old son of Mr. J. Wiggans, of this town, has been taken sudenly ill by a bite of a dog, which had been given poison a few days ago. A rash has broken out entirely over the whole of his person, but under the treatment of Dr. Washington, it is to be hoped the little fellow will soon be able to be about again.—Orangeville Gazette.

THE trial of Mrs. King, the mother of the unfortunate girl who died recently from the effects of an attempt to procure an abortion, was tried at Owen Sound on the 8th April before the Police Magistrate. A few days ago a brother of the unfortunate girl was tried for having procured the drug from the druggist in Wiarton, when he, in his evidence, stated that his mother had sent him for it and that she administered it. She was arrested and lodged in Owen Sound gaol, and after hearing the evidence to-day, she was committed to stand her trial at the next assizes.

FROM THE MOUNT OF OLIVES.—Our townsman, Mr. R. McKnight, has just recieved a valuable curiosity in the shape of a ruler from wood grown on the Mount of Olives, and manufactured in Jerusalem. Everybody in Ontario has heard of Mr. D. A. Jones, of Beeton, and his enterprise in importing bees from the Holy Land. While in Palestine, he purchased an olive tree on the slope of the Mount of Olives, had it brought into Jerusalem, and there made into various articles as curiosities. one of these he has sent to Mr. McKnight, Secretary of the Ontario Bee-keepers' Association and we have no doubt it will be highly prized by that gentleman.—*O. NOTICE.—We wish it distinctly understood, that we do not hold ourselves reponsible for the opinions expressed by our correspondents.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

SIR,—Permit me most respectfully through the medium of the STANDARD, to offer a few suggestions to farmers. Having had ample opportunity for observing the system of farming, or rather want of system, practiced throughout these northern counties. I flatter myself on being capable of giving a few common sense hints of a practical nature that if adopted, would add very materially to the prosperity and comfort of the farming community. "I will speak unto wise men, let them judge what I say."

In the first place farmers should never go beyond their means, that is, keep out of debt, except when there is a good prospect of unmistaken gain; be ware of store bills, little foxes spoil the vines, pay as you go, and when you have nothing to pay with, go without. If your means are small exercise the greater economy. Remember to save the cents, the dollars will take care of themselves. Your home may be an humble one, but make it as comfortable and attractive as your circumstances will permit. Then there will be no occasion for seeking vicious enjoyment at the card table, or in the bar-room.

The farmers motto should be, a little house well filled, a little wife well willed, easily found, and, a farm well tilled, yes, well tilled. Don't undertake to cultivate more than you can do well. Few acres well tilled, will produce more than twenty acres done in a lazy, slovenly manner.

Farmers summer-fallow your land, by all means, have at least a few acres yearly in this condition. As a substitute for manure, sow clover, and when it is twelve or sixteen inches high, plough it under, it is an excellent fertilizer and will be the means of filling your barn with grain, try it.

Now for stock; this branch of husbandry is being regarded in different parts of the Province as the only means of resting the exhausted soil, and replenishing empty coffers, and I think there is no section of country better adapted for raising stock, nor more needed than here. But farmers I appeal to you, for your own sakes, do raise better stock, get rid of those caricatures that stagger about your barnyards, I wonder you are not ashamed of them, they look as if they had made a codicil to their will, and were making a last effort to get to the tanyard, and as to hogs, well all that can be expected of some of them is a grunt. Surely where peas can be raised in such quantity and quality—pork of the very best fibre might become a profitable article for exportation, try it. Then a nice flock of sheep—they are meat, drink, diet and lodging, to farmers; six good ewes will stock a farm in two years, produce four hundred per cent, with but little trouble and less expense. Then a span of good mares will do the work of an ordinary farm, and raise two colts every year, worth at least $80, this I know for a fact.

I would say don't purchase more farming implements than you absolutely require and when required, go to the manufacturer direct, and you will save money.

Keep from passing your notes to pedlars, and endorse for no man,—never.

Have a shed for all your farm implements, and don't have them out in the fields, and behind fences, when you have done with them. I have often seen ploughs frozen in the fields and the handles protruding through the snow like elk's horns; reaping machines, harrows and waggons, in like manner. Well, now, we will not speak evil of our neighbor; but would you not agree with me that the farmer, (save the mark) who acts in this carless, lazy manner, should have a dose of cat o' nine tails laid on his posteriors? Don't wince, if the cap don't fit don't wear it. Fun aside,—do please, do have a place for everything, and everything in its place; habituate yourself to economy and neatness, and you will find it both pleasant and profitable.

I have thrown out a few hints with honesty of purpose, and a sincere desire for the prosperity of those for whom they are intended; and if they should benefit one, by practical adoption, I will feel repaid a thousand fold for my trouble. I am satisfied; yes, confident, that the few suggestions I have made, if carried out systematically, would produce the fruits of wealth and comfort, and that the domestic and social condition of the farming community would undergo a radical change, so that squalid poverty and discontent would be supplanted by the fear of God, love of country, and general prosperity.

Thanking you for your valuable space,

Yours truly,

JAMES A. BLAIR.

COUNTY ITEMS.

CHATSWORTH

On Monday evening last the tenders for erecting the new grain warehouse here were opened and the contract awarden to Messrs. J. & W. Taylor for $1,690. The building is to be 40 feet by 70 feet with 24 foot wall and of a capacity of 40,000 bushels, It will have four parallel stone walls 70 feet long under it, and will be filled from the second floor, which will be approached by a bridge. The warehouse will be built on the modern plank principle and will be one of the best and most convenient north of Toronto, and a credit to the place.—Adv.

WILLIAMSFORD

On Saturday last a son of Mr. McCan was kicked in the thigh by a horse.

Same day Mr. George Stanley was putting an addition to his barn, on turning one of the logs the man at the corner struck his axe into the log intending to help to turn it, in doing it he cut Mr. Stanley's fore finger clean off above the upper joint, and the second finger was also cut to the bone. How the thumb, in fact the whole hand, escaped, is a miracle. Dr. Dannard, who had just returned from Mr. McCan's, hurried to the spot and dressed the wound.

John Douglas, Jr., cut his leg with the axe while hewing.

A son of Mr. Rossman's managed to cut two toes off his younger brother's foot. Mr. Rossman is rather unfortunate. One of his daughters a few days ago while amusing her self with her school mates fell and broke her leg.

Ephriam Page, a brother of the young man who cut Mr. Stanley, had an ear cut off in the chopping bush. A rather close shave.

We are indebted to the Owen Sound Advertiser for the above items.

HER LAST SLEIGH RIDE.

"Oh, mamma! is it snowing?" "Yes, darling it has just begun." "Isn't it nice, mamma; you know I want to live to hear the sleigh bells again." "Hush my child, mamma will not let you die. No, darling, you shall have many sleigh rides yet before you die." No, not many, mamma; if I could have just one it would be so nice." A little girl who had seen the snow come and go nine times lay dying in her humble home on St. Antoine street. Weeks and weeks the fever had burned within her and its fierce fire showed itself in the deep blue eyes and the lovely, innocent face. The mother, an ever constant watcher at the sufferer's pillow, had never given up hope, but the child, with that knowledge which seems to come to all before death knew that she would never join her merry playmates over on the school ground. Day by day as the fever burned she had wished for the snow to come, and when the white flakes fell the other day the loving mother changed the child's position that she might, unwarned, catch the first glimpse of the fleecy snow. The child gazed out into the flurried air long and earnestly, and then when the pain made her writhe, she turned an appealing look to the sad-faced mother, and said: "But mamma, I don't believe I shall ever have another sleigh ride. Now promise me that if the snow is on the ground when I die you'll have my coffin carried to the grave on a sleigh." "Why my sweet child, why do you make such a request! You shall not die—you will grow better to morrow." "But, mamma, promise me will you? Please, mamma, please." "Yes darling, yes." "Oh thank you, mamma; that's so nice. See, it is growing dark outside. Pull the bed near the window, mamma, so that I can see the street lamp. There, see—the flakes—they glisten Just—like—diamonds. It will be sleighing in the morning' mamma, and I shall hear the bells." Like the snowflake that falls upon the warm earth she melted away, and no one knows whether she woke to hear music and bells on that morning we shall one day open our eyes upon. A few days after passers by turned to look at a small funeral procession, and wondered why the undertaker had put his hearse upon runners so early in the season.—Detroit Free Press.

A FATHERLESS COUNTRY.

A man recently received a woodcut picture of George Washington, and pinned it to the wall near his office door. One day while at work his little girl came into his room, and espying the picture, started the following dialogue:—

"Who is that a picture of, papa?"

"Washington."

"Who was Washington?"

"Father of this country."

"Why was he called father of this country, papa?"

"Because he fought for its independence, and was a great good man."

"Is he alive now, papa?"

"No."

"When did he die?"

"December 14, 1799."

"Who is the father of this country now, papa?"

"No one; it's fatherless."

The little one was silent for a few moments, and then inquired:—

"Was he the little boy who could not tell a lie?"

"The same."

"Well, this country will never have another father, will it, papa?"

And the conversation was concluded with the emphatic remark:—

"Never! not even a step father!"

COLLISION ON THE NORTHERN RAIL WAY

About 6.30 on the morning of the 8th inst, as the Hamilton train was backing in here before starting on her regular trip a freight special collided with her about half way between Allandale and here, killing one man and injuring others. The man who was killed is a mechanical engineer in the railway's employ named Thornto, who came up from Toronto last night to make some repairs. He worked all night and before starting for home said he would take a run over and see Barrie. He was just entering the baggage-car from the platform when the trains met, killing him instantly the back of his head being completely jammed in. It is reported he leaves a wife and large family. The engine on the fraight train was running backwards, pulling the train, and she struck with such force that the tender was driven completely into the passenger coach, and the cab of the engine was smashed very badly. The fireman jumped without receving injury, but the engineer stood at his post, receving only a slight cut on the of side the head. His escape from death was most miraculous, as the cab of his engine is a complete wreck. One of the trainmen got his feet crushed but escaped otherwise, It is reported that a man was in the passenger-coacd when the train left Allandale, and has not been seen since. It is feared he is under the engine-tender, which is still buried in the passenger-coach. The collison has wrecked an engine, baggage-car, passenger-coach, and some flats. The track has been cleared, and trains are now passing as usual. There are a great many theories advance as to the cause of the accident, but it is hard to say who is to blame or how it happened. There was a heavy fog at the time, and the passengers at Barrie station could not see the train at a quarter of a mile off.

At 6.30 this afternoon an inquest was held on the body of David Thornton, who was killed by the railway collison this morning. After hearing evidence the jury returned a verdict blam both conductors and both firemen for negligence, and expressing their belief that the company should see that the rules are strictly enforced. The young man who lost his toes is Butler, not Bedford, as stated in the morning report.

If you suffer from any chronic disease arising from Impure Blood, Sluggish Liver, disordered Kidneys or inactivity of the Bowels: if your Nervous System is debilitated from whatever cause arising, do not despair, but procure a trial bottle of Burdock Blood Bitters; it will only cost 10 cents. Large Bottles $ 1.00. For sale by all medicine dealers.

RAISING A NEW CROP OF HAIR.

It was one of the by-laws of Heartache's Heavenly Hair Restorer, that it should be used liberally before retiring, rubbing itself into the scalp. Just before he went to bed that night, the man bolted the back door, put the cat in the woodshed, come in whistling the Fatinitza waltz, danced up to the clock shelf, and poured out what he supposed to be his hair fertilizer, he mopped it all over the scalp and stirred it well around the roots of the little hedge of hair at the back of his neck.

The glue bottle, by an unearthly coincidence, was nearly the same in shape and size as the hair sap bottle.

He went to bed.

"George," said his wife, turning her face to the wall, "that stuff you're putting on your hair smells as bad as a pan of soap grease."

"Perhaps I had better go up stairs and sleep," snarled George. "You're mighty sensitive! You wouldn't xpect that a man can put stuff on his head that will make his hair grow, and have it smell like the essence of wintergreen, would you?"

They went to bed as mad as turks.

This particular bald-headed man like a good many other bald-headed men, had to get up and build the fires. When he arose, next morning the sun peeped in at the window and saw the pillow cling to the back of his head like a great white chignon. At first he did not realize his condition; he thought it must have caught on a pin or shirt button. It looked ridiculous, and he would throw it back on the bead before his wife saw it, so he caught it quickly by one hand and "yanked."

"Oh! Oh! Darnation fishhooks! whats been going on hear? Thunder an' lightnin'!" and he began to claw at his scalp like a lunatic. His wife sprang up from her couch and began to sob hysterically.

Oh, don't, George! What is it? What is the matter?"

George was dancing about the room, the pillow dangling by a few hairs, his scalp covered with something that looked like sheet copper, while the air was redolent of war like expletives, a sif a dictionary had exploded With a womans instinct the poor wife took in the situation at a glance and exclaimed:

"It is the glue."

The bald headed man sat down in a chair and looked at her a moment in silence and then uttered the one expressive word:

"Glue!"

Now began a series of process and experience unheard of in the annals of chemistry.

"Jane, you must soak it off with warm water. I've got to go to Utica to-day."

"I can't, George," she returned in agility tone: "it's water-proof."

"Yes I might have known it; and I suppose it's fire-proof too, ain,t it?"

He scratched over the smoothe plating with his finger nails.

"It's as hard as iron."

"Yes—he said it was glue," replied she inocently, "can't you skin it off with your razor, George?"

"Don't be a bigger fool than you are, Jane. Get me that coarse file in the woodshed."

It may be imagined what followed, and now as the bald-headed man sits in his office he never removes his hat, for his entire skull is a howling waste of blistered desert, relieved here and there by cases of black court-plaster

A MISTAKE.

It is a great and often fatal mistake to take repeated drastic purgatives for constipation of the bowles, they induce piles ond cause debility of the bowels. Burdock Blood Bitters is a safe and perfect regulator of the bowels, arousing the torpid Liver and all the secretions to a healthy action; acting on the Kidneys, and renovating and toning the system in the most perfect manner.

STRANGE HALLUCINATION.

A curious case came up in the court of Chancery April 1st before Vice-Chancellor Blake, being an application by Mrs. John Albaugh, a handsome woman of Garafraxa, county Wellington' for a commission of lunacy for her husband, who is a wealthy man. Mrs. Albaugh testified that they were married 30 years ago, and that he had been insane for 18 years. One of his hallucinations was that his family were all devils and it would be no crime to kill them. For 16 years he had lived in a room by himself, which he kept locked when he occupied it and did his own cooking He had raved about calling meetings of the people to get up a raid on the banks in order to get gold and silver to pave the streets of New Jerusalem, which was to be located on his farm. He had threatened her life frequently He had been in the asylum twice. He had told her that he had fasted for forty days, because no one that had a dirty stomach could enter New Jerusalem. He had often threatened to roast the house and all the devils in it. He labored under the hallucination that she was to be Queen of the new city and ride on a scarlet horse and marry the Pope, which was to be the last wedding in the world. He had given her $1,500 which she spent in raising her family. The arguments in the case will be heard on Friday.—Spectator.

Do not let prejudise stand in the way of relief if you suffer from any lingering disease, Burdock Blood Bitters cure others, why should it not benefit you? It is a specific for all forms of Blood, Liver, and Kidney Complaints, Nervous Headache, General Debility, Scrofula and all diseases of the Secretory system. Trial Bottles 10 cents.

ENTERPRISE.—Just to show the enterprise of our fellow-townsman, Finlay MacRea, Esq., ex-Warden of this county, we may mention that he in company with Mr. Robert Bull, carpenter and builder, with seven workmen, went into the Township of Glenelg, thirteen miles from Durham, on Monday last, the 4th inst., and erected one story and a half framed dwelling House, 16x20, and had almost completed before dark, it only taking a few hours work form, two men to finish it next morning ready for occupation. Who says there is no life in Durham after this? All the workmen but two came back to Durham on Monday night.—Review.

IN THE MIDST OF PERIL.

By the Author of "Hidden Quicksands," "A Relentless Foe," "Maggie O'Connor's Fortunes," &c., &c.

Some previous hints of her fears had perhaps decided Mr. Coghlan's brother in his choice of the shy, quiet looking clergyman whose college testimonials were so good and whose manner was so unattractive.

Mrs. Coghlan's estimate of the tutor's retiring disposition was confirmed by his conduct that evening, when the gentlemen joined them. He seated himself at a distant table and amused himself with looking at the book of engravings, while Tim O'Brien coaxed Eva to take her harp and by-and-by was singing with her and Glorvina. Both girls sang delightfully and Tim had a fine rich barytone voice. They sang national songs together admirable, while seated unnotised and under no constraint, the young clergyman gazed and listened, feeling as if he were in Paradise.

The music went on till late—till Murphy, the old buttler, brought in the hot water glasses, and whiskey for the usual brew of toddy; then Tim O'Brien declared he must be going.

"Nay," said the hospitable Squire, "not to-night. The times are not fit for solitary night-walks. Lily will have a bed got ready for you."

"It is not I that will refuse such an offer," laughed O'Brien, pretending to speak with a stronger accent than usual. "I will only too thankfully accept the chance of a breakfast with these ladies on the morrow."

So it was decided that their young neighbor should sleep at the Priory, and Mrs. Coghlan gave the needful orders for his bed-room to be prepared.

CHAPTER III.

St. Kevin's Priory was a large building of an oblong form, with a centre court of great size. The front faced the south, and there were turrets at some height at each end of the greatest facade, though there were none at the other two corners of the house. The eastern turret was a tall tower, at the top of which was suspended an alarm; the western one was full of small chambers used as bachlors roomswhen the house was full of guests during the shooting-season; for the stairs leading to the upper story from the south corridor were so remarkably steep that few ladies would have cared to ascend or decend them. They had in fact been built from a door made in the wall of the tower to connect its rooms with the family apartments, and thus save the guests from ascending the corkscrew staircase from the ground floor to their rooms.

The family slept in the corridor from which the staircase ascended, and there was no slight put upon the tutor by fixing his room in the turret, where O'Brien also was to be domiciled that night.

There were other guest chambers on the west side, but not connected with the inhabited part of the house. The servants slept in the east wing, in which were the officies. The north side was uninhabited, though still left furnished. It was said to be naunted, and was carefully avoided by the servants.

The room in which tutor now found himself was even on three sides, and rounded on that of the tower, where there was a long window commanding, as he percieved, a glorous view over the park, now softly defined in the clear moonlight. The room was well fitted up, and had a bookcase and a writing-table.

To his own surprise, for he had had a long and fatiguing coach journey, and was wont to slumber profoundly every night the young tutor could not sleep for thinking of the matchless eyes and of the thrilling voice which had called back the past as Glorvina sang, "The harps that once through Tara's Halls." How the air and the words haunted him! How those eyes smiled at him through the darkness and 'murdered sleep,' ! The stable-yard clock was beneath his window. He heard twelve, one, two, three, strike, yet no slumber came to his eyes. Presently there was a sound—a muffled tread outside his door. The tutor's hearing was quick. He sat up in bed and listened. Yes, there was certainly a step outside. Who could be moving at that hour?

Suddenly he heard a tremendous crash, and then a faint groan. The tutor sprang out of bed, lighted his candle by the rushlight which, in those days of steel and flint, was usually kept in bed-rooms, and hastened out of his room. There was no one outside, as he could see plainly, the circular landing, surrounded by four chambers, being brilliantly illuminated by the moonbeams falling through a sky light. He advanced to the head of the stairs, and saw, lying at the bottom of the flight, a human form motionless.

He hurried down at once; but before he reached the bottom, Mr. Coghlan's door was opened, and he also appeared with a light, followed by his wife.

What had happened was plain enough, Tim O'Brien lay stuned at the bottom of the stair case. Mr. Coghlan and the tutor were soon bending over him; they raised him gently in their arms, and he uttered a groan, but by-and-by opened his eyes and then exclaimed, "My arm!"—glancing at his right arm, which hung useless at his right side.

"It is true; he has broken his arm," said Mr. Coghlan. "Help me to carry him into this chamber, Surridge, please. It is a mercy it is not his neck, seeing the distance he has fallen."

Between them they raised and supported O'Brien into a large chamber opened from the corridor. Everybody was awake now, and two fair heads looked out of two near doors to see what was the matter. Mrs. Choghlan hastened to tell the girls, while O'Brien was placed on the bed.

"We must send off Tom for the doctor at once," remarked Mr. Coghlan.

"If you—if Mr. O'Brien liked," said James Surridge diffidently, "I can set the arm. I studied surgery when I was thinking of going out as a missionary."

"By all means," exclaimed Mr. Coghlan, "that is—— I suppose you would be glad to have it done, Tim, at once? And meanwhile send for the doctor to see it is all right."

After a moment's hesitation, O'Brien sullenly assented, and, with astonishing skill, considering he was only an amateur surgeon, the tutor set the bone, his hand seemed to be strong and tender. At the end of the operation O'Brien thanked him graciously.

"It feels all right," he said.

"Neverless I shall tell the groom to ride over for Doctor Macnamara at once," decided Coghlan.

"Will you send me a sponge and some vinegar?" asked the tutor. "The arm must be painful, and wetting the bandage will releave the pain."

"Do you mean to stay with me?" asked O'Baien, glancing up at him.

"Yes certainly till the doctor comes?" and Surraidge quietly drew a chair to the side of the bed and sat down.

"You are a good fellow," said Tim greatfully.

The young clergyman sat beside the suffer till daylight, when the doctor came. Doctor Macnamara examined the arm, declared he could not have set the bone better, and asked how the accident happened.

"I thought," replied Tim, "that I heard a slight noise in the house, so I got up and went out to see what caused it. I had no candle; the moon was sufficient, I thought. I stole softly down-stairs but on the third or fourth step, I tripped over something—I fancy a strong string—and fell at the bottom of the stairs, as you know."

"A flight of forty steeps, fully!" exclaimed Mr. Coghlan. "He means the bachelors staircase, which leads to the turret chambers."

The doctor shook his head.

"I wonder he did not break his neck!" he said. "I remember how steep the staircase is. Well, you must keep quiet now, Mr. O'Brien, and it will soon be all right. But was their any one in the house?"

"Not a soul; and there has been no visible attempt either at the enterance," replied Mr. Coghlan,

"Then it must have been some sound from the stable-yard I heard," said Tim.

"Like enough! I am sorry your kind intention to defend us should have cost you so dearly, Tim" continued his host; "but we are obliged to you just as much as if you had caught an army of invadors.'

"We had better leave O'Brien now," observed the doctor, "and go and examine the string of which he speaks. I hope this is not a bit of mistake of Master Teddy's."

"I will send one of the woman-serants to relieve you in a few minutes, Surridge," said Mr. Coghlan to the tutor; "and you had better go and make up your loss of sleep."

Then the doctor mounted the steep stairs to see how the accident had occured, and found that a skipping-rope had been ingeniously tied from baluster to baluster. It hung loose after the mischief had been done, forced by O'Briens fall.

"What a shameful trick!" exclaimed the master, angrily. "I will whip master Ted for this; it must be his doing."

"It might have caused even a worse misfortune," said the doctor gravely, "than it has."

Then they descended the stairs together, the doctor consented to stay for breakfast, and Mr. Coghlan proceeded at once to the nursery, to find Teddy. The boy was sleeping a happy smile on his face—Teddy Coghlan was a beautiful child—but his father, seriously angry, was by no means mollified by the pretty picture. He awoke his son at once.

"Teddy," he said sternly, as the blue eyes opened, "what is this you have done? Did you tie a string acrose the bachelors stair-case?"

"Papa" exclaimed Teddy, "what is it?"

"What is it? You naughty boy, you have nearly broken Tim O'Briens neck!"

"Tim O'Briens!"

"Yes sir; he has fallen down the bachlors stairs—tripped up by a skipping roap."

"Oh, papa" said Teddy "I am sorry! I meant it for the new tutor."

"The new tutor! and why should you want to break his neck?"

"I didn't want to break his neck!" whimpered Teddy. "I only wanted to play trick because Norah said that he was a muff and that Glorvina hated him!"

"Norah is a wicked child to tell such falsehoods! But you had no right to play such a trick as that. How did you manage it?"

"I listened till I heard a new step go by?" sobbed Teddy; "then I got up and went out. Nurse had not come up from her supper, so I tied the skipping-roap. I thought I would get up early and see him tumble."

"You were a very cruel wicked boy? You might have killed him."

"Oh, no, no!" cried Teddy. "It doesnt kill one to have a tumble."

"Some tumbles do," said his father drily. "At any rate one has broken Tim O'Brien's arm; so prepare for a whipping master Teddy."

And the punishment followed in due course.

CHAPTER IV.

Teddy's first introduction to his tutor was as a penitent, who had to apoligize for intending mischief; and James found it needful to point out to the boy the greater danger of practical jokes. Teddy was much impressed by the gentle reproof of his tutor, in whom he saw none of the stupidity assigned to him by Norah.

"It's just like girls," he said to himself, "to fancy a fellow is a fool if he does not care for them. I will punch Nora's head for her."

The tutor found time to visit O'Brien very often that morning, and to do all he could for the young man's relief.

'My father has been sent for I suppose?' said Tim, on one of these visits.

"Yes Mr. Coghlan has sent to him; but Tom brought word that your father had gone to Ballinara and would not be back till the evening."

There was a pause; and Tim said—

"Would you mind doing something for me? You will walk out, I suppose to-day?"

"I am going out with my pupil presently."

"Then would you mind going over to our place and telling the gamekeeper what has happened to me? He will be expecting me to go out with him and some friends as I had appointed and he can go to them and explain my absence."

"I shall be very happy," replied the tutor. "Where shall I go?"

"To Polwarth. Oh, Teddy nows the way? He has often riden over there on his pony with Coghlan."

"It is not to long a walk for the boy, I suppose?" asked James.

"No; he could walk twice as far, the young scamp! I will give it to him for the trick he has played me!"

Surridge promised to do as O'Brien asked; and soon afterwards set out with Teddy for his walk.

"Is Tim better?" asked the boy penitently.

"Yes; he seems free from pain."

"It must hurt very much to break hee's arm," observed Teddy. I am glad it was not you; but I didn't mean to hurt Tim.

"Can you show me the way to his home?" asked the tutor.

"Of course I can; but it's a jolly long way."

'Too long for your little legs?'

A ROLAND FOR AN OLIVER.

A most amusing book is "The adventures of Mick Callighan, M. P.," just published in London. Mick, on theevening before leaving his paternal roof to seek his fortune, goes to the room of his tutor, Father McQuade, whom he found enveloped in a capacious night robe, surmounted by a night cap of the ancient extinguisher shape, tied around his head with a red cotton handkerchief af a wonderful pattern.

"An' now," said he, "kneel down till I give ye me blessin'. I'm not in me canonicals, but all the picthers I've seen of the blessed Saint Pether represents him wid bare legs—seein,' I suppose, bein' a fisherman, he had frequently to wade in the salt wather: an' as for driss, I never seen more an him, nor I've an meself this blessed minnit. It's nat the vistmints makes the praste, Mick, nor the gintleman ayther, as may be ye'll foind to your cost."

In thecourse of events Mick gives assistance to a man driving pigs to market. Both being hungry, they go into an eating house, and one of them takes up a dirty newspaper, which is well marked with mustard.

"Musthard?" said Larry: "fege? that minds me av Mick Murphy an' Dan Collins, two frins av moine that come over to England for the rapin' av the harvist, an' was walkin' on the quays in this town; an' mind ye, now, Danny had been over before, but Micky had niver been out o' the car-radjus o' the town o' Tipperary. they wor that hungry after the voige they didn't what to do at all, at all. When Danny sees 'Ristorant' wrut up over a shop, 'See now,' sez he, 'that's a place to ate; an' in they both goes: an' thin sur, they sees the waither wid a towl over his arm, and sez Danny, sez he, 'What can we get to ate?' 'Anything at all,' sez the waither. 'thin bring me a plate of mate,' sez Danny. So in comes the waither wid a plate of mate an' a large bowl of musthard; an' moind ye, now, nayther Micky nor Danny had iver seen musthard before in all their born days. 'What's the pay for the mate?' sez Danny. 'A shillin, sur,' sez the waither. 'An' what's that?' sez he, pointin' to the bowl. 'that's musthard,' cez the waither. 'An' what do you do wid it?' 'Yes ates it wid the mate, to be sure,' sez he, 'An' what the pay for it?' 'Nothin', sur,' sez the waither. Thin Danny looks at Micky, an' Micky looks at Danny, an' they both winks. Whin the waither turned his back, sez Danny, 'See here, now, Micky,' sez he 'I'll tell ye what we'll do, we'll pocket the mate for the journey, an' ate the stuff he gives for nothin',' an' wid that Micky rowls up the mate in his handkercher an' puts it in the crown av his hat; an' Danny he kep' stirrin' up the musthard an' after a while he opens his mouth an' takes a great dollop av it. Down goes his head, an' the tears kep' runnin' down out av his eyes. 'Danny, lad, sez Micky, 'what does be the matter wid ye?' Danny wouldn't let on at all, at all. 'But,' sez he, 'whiniver I think o'the death o'me great-grandfather, that wor kilt at the battle o'the 'Boyne, I can't kape from cryin' at all.' 'Don't take on wid ye like that,' sez Micky. 'Here, now, we're över in England, an' we'll make a power o' money at the rapin' before the harvest's over.' All this toime Danny he was stirrin' the musthard, an' he hands the spoon to Micky. he takes a big spoonful too, an' the tears come runnin down his nose. Danny wakes up, an' sez he, 'Micky,' sez he, 'what does be the matther wid ye?' 'Fegs,' sez Micky, 'I'm cryin because ye wern't killed along wid your great-grandfather at the battle of the Boyne?' Ha, he, ha? Begorra, he gave him a rowlint for an illiphist that toime.

THE REV. DR. PUNSHON

We feel sure that all our readers, without distinction of creed, will deeply regret to hear of the death of the Rev. Dr. Punshon, the eminent Wesleyan divine, at the early age of fifty seven. Most people will remember especially those of the religious body of which he was such a shining light, the five years he passed in Canada, and recall the cheery voice and eloquent tongue of the first minister of the Metropolitan Church. The following short sketch of the Rev. gentleman we condense from the Toronto Mail

He possessed a rare power of moving the masses by a fervid manner, and a secret power of persuasion which had nothing of the purely senseational element about it. The speech came from the heart, and did its secret work there. It is not too much to say that Dr. Punshon infused a fresher and higher vitality not only into the Methodist Church, but into the entire Christian community, with whom his essentially catholic spirit made him from the first, a welcome guest.

In 1868 he left England for Canada, and entered upon a new field of triumphant labour. During his residence at Toronto he certainly occupied the first place as a pulpit orator. But that was not all. He was a zealous worker in the cause of his Church and that of religious life generally. That he was utterly unselfish his whole course proves. His whole career showed a cheerful and hearty willingness—or rather vehement desire—to spend and be spent in the cause of his Master. As we have already said, he breathed new life into the Methodist body in Canada, his energy and fervour were manifested on all hands. The Metropolitan church arose under the spell of his eloquence as if touched by the wand of an enchanter. He was perhaps the most effective agent in bringing about Methodist Union; whilst the Victoria College Endowment, and the Foreign Missions of the Wesleyan Church, notably that to Japan, owed to his exertions the success which attended them. Dr. Punshon held the presidency of the Wesleyan Conference here five times, so complete was the confidence of the Church in his administrative ability, so warm their admiration of his zeal, power, and devotion.

Of late years the almost herculean labours of Dr. Punshon appears to have told upon his powerful physique. Certainly no one who had the pleasure of meeting him in Toronto, and enjoying his genial society, could have thought it probable that he would be cut down at so early an age by the breaking of "the wheel at the "cistern." Death may overtake men in many ways, by casualty or diseases; but no one could have anticipated that the robust frame we used to see in the streets or in the pulpits of the city was so early to be laid low. We can only add a simple expression of our sympathy with our Methodist brethren, by whom the loss will be felt most keenly. Others can remember the sturdy manlines and willing sympathy of the departed minister; but they alone can fully measure the loss.

Earl Beacon'sfield, England's late Premier, died on Tuesday morning 19th inst., at four o'clock r. m. The announcement was not unlooked for, as he had been suffering from asthma for some time past, and very little hope was entertained from the first, of his ultimate recovery. Thus one by one of the great statesmen of the age keep dropping off.

Obituary.—We are again called on to notice the death of another of our settlers, in the person of Mr. Archibald Park of Bentinck, who died last Sunday evening at the ripe age of 84 years. Mr. Park had been ailing for a few months and gradually went off. He came to Bentinck 31 years ago, and has always been noted as one of our best agriculturists. He took great interest in raising superior and thorough-bred stock and in the Agricultural Society, of which he has been vice-President for some years. His family are mostly well-to-do, and show the fruits of an early training, based on the principle that Industry and economy are the sure ways to success. His friends and neighbors will no doubt miss his genial countenance and exemplary mode of agricultural pursuits.—Review.

FLESHERTON

From a Correspondent.

While out delivering bread on Saturday, the 19th inst., Mrs, Thompson who was accompanied by her two children, met with what might have proved a very serious accident. Some of the barness became loose, causidg the horse to kick and swerve to one side precipitating the waggon with its occupants and bread over an enbankment of from 7 to 8 feet. Mrs. T. was considerably brused, but the children escaped with a few scratches.

Quite an excitement was caused by a runnaway team and a man running after them, quite black in the face. Upon inves tigation it was found to be no phenomenon, as the man had been born so.

A well known hard case was seen passing through our village in a farmers waggon, who stated he had found him lying on the road in an insensible condition with his head shaved, and his face painted. His trouble did not appear to have ended as he was lying in the bottom of the waggon with a circle tooth harrow over him. Verily the way of the transgressor is hard.

The Enumerators are here and, they have a column in which they put down all the widows; upon being asked why they did that by one of that class, it was stated because Sir John was going to get then all a man each.

Correspondence.

Notice.—We wish it disinctly understood, that we do not hold ourselves reponsible for the opinions expressed by our correspondents.

IS THE GRANGE INSURANCE COMPANY THE IDEAL OF THE GRANGE.

To the Editor of the Standard.

Sir,—As an interested member of the Grange Insurance company from its ealist formation, and also having acted in the capacity of an agent for the company. I have been examining the annul repoat of 1881, and unless some one can convince me to the contrary, I have come to conclusion that the Grange Insurance Company has not in any respect reduced the cost of insurance, but on the contrary, has set a most extrordinary example of extravagance in its management. I sustain my conclusions by facts and figures taken from their annul report of 1880, and I have just taken the Sydenham Insurance Company as a comparison, shewing the expenditure of both in detail:—

The Sydenham Fire Insurance Company

Amt paid for losses during the year of 1880	$1573.78
Paid Fire Inspector	12.50
" Director's Fees	1.20
" Salaries	120.00
" Printing	8.20
" Postage	20.67
"Stationary	3.63
" Petty Expences	00.00
" Auditors	00.00

Dominion Grange Insurance Company.

Amt. paid for losses during the year of 1880	$2181 62
Paid Fire Inspector	91.90
" Legal Expences	51.88
" Director's Fees	465.80
" Salaries	2118.75
" Printing	140.84
" Postage	171.59
" Stationary	13.70
" Petty Expences	50.63
" Auditors	63.25

By the above statements which are taken from the reports of each of the Companies it can be seen that it costs the Grange Insurance Company $143,-78 (between Legal and Inspection) expenses to settle sixteen losses amounting to $2181.62, and the Sydenham Insurance Co. $12.70 to settle four losses amounting to $1578.78, just about eleven times less expenses Sydenham than in the Grange Company. In the next place take the salaries. The Grange Co. pays its directors $465.80, and the Sydenham Insurance Co. $58, only about one seventh the cost. The Grange pays its Manager Treasurer and Secretary $2118.75, when the Sydenham Co. only pays $120, showing that the Grange Co. pays seventeen times more for such officers. Then take the item of postage in the grange Co., $171.59, which would pay postage of three cents each on nearly 60,000 letters. This is perfectly absurd. I do not care who would tell me, unless, that the man that mailed the letters paid postage on himself every time he went to the office. Now the fact is by comparison shown above, and by further comparing the aggregate expenditure of the Companies, less the amount paid for fire claims, viz. :—The Grange Insurance Co. $4,775,-05, and the Sydenham Co. $290.08, just about seventeen times less. Well, Mr. Editor, you may say, and so may my fellow farmers. Oh? Knott is an agent for a Stock Insurance Co., and probably does not like the Grange Co., that he is insured in the Sydenham, &c.; but, sir, I say no! I highly respect the officers of the Grange Insurance Co. I am of course an agent for a Stock Company. I have no interest in the Sydenham Insurance Co., but my insurance is expiring in the Grange, and a large number of other farmers insured in the Grange as well, who I insured myself has been asking me what was my oppinion about the Co. I have always said I believed it to be one of the safest Companies for agricultural insurance in Canada, but I certainly think that it might not be so expensive. It is not seventeen times a better Company than the Sydenham Co., one of our home institutions. It does not give you 17 times more security. It has only about one-third more, all told, of policies in force today, and these policies does not cover over one-third more risks, and I see no reason why that such enormous salaries and other expenditures should be enacted. The object of paying good officers well is highly recommendable; and no one will deny the ability of the founder of this institution who now is almost the heart and liver of it. It is nevertheless our duty as policy holders to guard against the first appearance of extravagance. And it is quite evident that their is no paralell between the economy of our friends of the Sydenham Mutual and the Grange Insurance Company. If there is, will some one prove it to me?

E. E. Knott.

Springfield, Euphrasia, March 31st, 1881.

To the Editor of the Standard.

Sir.—We observe that the president of the Glenelg Agriltural Society has called another meeting of the directors at the "Revere House" Saturday evening, 23rd inst., at 8 o'clock, to further consider the case of the defaulting late secretary treasure of saidSociety-it is to be hoped that Mr. Lyons will at once pay over the money in default to the society, and therefore save further trouble and expense. We trust that this unplesent case will, in future, prove a warning to all Treasures having itching palms, and an overmastering desire to appropriate public funds intrusted to their charge and lead them to pause before committing an act which might result in giving them free quarters in the provincial Penitatiary for half a decade.

—The Barnesville (Ga.) Gazette says: "there is a lady living in this county who has had five husbands. She lives on the old Hightower Trail, and married four widowers in succession. The remarkable coincidence connected with this good lady's matrimonial ventures is that all her husbands lived on the same road and just one mile and a half from each other. The first widower lived one and a half miles from the lady, who was a widow, the second, third and fourth lived about the same distance from each other, so she has in turn had charge of each of the residences, and is now living happily with her fifth husband, within seven miles of her original home.

HOW TO GET A WIFE IN INDIA.

(Life in Bombay.)

When a man in a decent rank of life wishes to marry, and can prove that he possesses the means of maintaining a wife, it is customary for him to apply to the mistress of the Byculla School, state his wishes and qualifications, and inquire into the number and character of the marriageable girls. An investigation immediately follows as to eligibility; and if all promises satisfactorily, he is forthwith invited to drink tea with the schoolmistress upon an appointed evening, to give him an opportunity of making his selection. The elder girls are then informed of his intended visit and its purport; and those who desire to enter the matrimonial lists come forward and signify their wish to join the party. Frequently four or five competitors make their appearance on these occasions in the mistress, room. The gentleman, while doing his best to make himself universally agreeable, yet contrives in the course of the evening, to mark his preferance for one particular lady. Should these symptoms of bedding affection be favorable recieved, he tenders his proposals in due form on the following morning. But it often occurs that the sellected lady does not participate in the inamorato's sudden flame, in which cass she is at perfect liberty to decline the honor of his alliance, and reserve herself for the next tea-party exhibition.

We have known the the instance when an amorous old gentleman from an out station presented himself three successive times at these soirees in the hope of obtaining a wife to cheer the solitudes of his up country residence, but all in vain; the young ladies unanimously reject dhim ith the highest disdain, wondering "how such an ugly old fellow could have the impudence to think of a wife? But a very different reception is given to the young dashing sergeant or smart-looking conductor; their attentions are never repulsed, and the announcement of the "chosen intends," as Miss Squeers would say, is anticipated with the utmost impatience by many anxious young heart. The wedding speedly followed, the bride.s modest "trousseau,, being provided from the funds of the estabishment, and every girl in the school cheerfully contributing her aid in the manufacture of the dresses.

Narrow Escape.—Mr Andrew Saunders, a son of Mr. David Saunders, of Sarawak, met with an accident, on Thursday last, which nearly terminated his life. While driving a load of lumber, it upset and fell on top of him leaving onlf a portion of his legs visible. A gentleman passing accidentally noticed his legs, and set to work at once to recover the body, believing that life was extinct. Further assistance arriving, the load was removed, and it was found that Mr. Saunders was still alive, although severely brused and an arm broken. The marvel is that he was not smothered in the mud, as he was altogether unrecognizable when taken out of it. He is doing as well as can be expected considering the injuries received.—Tribune.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—On Monday evening last, as announced, the congregational meeting was held in the Presbyterian church in this town, to try and come to amicable arrangementin regard to union of the congeration. A vote was taken wether the congeration would accept the proposal of those who have separated from the congregation, as it was belived by some that by this means many of those who had left the church would be brought back. The proposal was rejected by a large majority leaving the state of affairs in nearly the same state as it was.

RUNNAWAY.—A team of horses belonging to Mr. Richard Haley of Glenelg, took fright while at the elevator on Wedenshay last, and run towards the village, and were caught by Mr. Allen McDougal nearly opposite Haskett Bros. They did not become detached from the waggon and no harm was done.

REYNOLDS & SON have becomn so satisfied advertising pays, that they have found it necessary to increase their space to enable them to let their patrons know that they are keeping pace with the times. Read their advertisement carefully, and then call and be convinced that they are live men, and do what they say.

Seeding is now fairly commenced and farmers are busy, and as the season for seeding is short and is getting well advanced there is no time to be lost in order to have it done in good time. Fall wheat is having a hard struggle for existence, and if rain does not soon come their will be a great many fields to be resown with other grain. If this crop should be a failure, it will be a heavy loss to the country, as there was a great amount of it sown the past season.

A NARROW ESCAPE.—John James Bryden, son of Mr R. C. Bryden of this place, who is at present residing near Harrisburg, had a pretty close call on the 16th inst, He was working in the woods, and had taken a gun out with him, which he stood against a log, when about to return home he went to pick up the gun, in doing which he struck the hammer against the log, causing it to go off, (the gun we mean, not the log) lodging some of the charge in the rim of his hat.

BURGLARS.—Some evil disposed person, or persons, made a froceable entry into the grocery store of Mr. Gould, on Tuesday night last, and appropriated some of the contents, and not contented with that, but must need mix up some rice, sugar, and sundry other articles into a confused mass. Mr. Gould is absent and the amount taken cannot be ascertained until his return. We have not learn whether suspition is attacted to any one. Our energetic constable has taken the matter in hand, and we hope his efforts to trace the miscreant will be successful.

A MAPLE sugar Social was held in Dufferin Hall on Monday evening last. We have attended an aimost unlimitted number of social the past winter, but decidedly this was the sweetest of them all. There was biscuits and hot sugar provided in abundance, with an occasional draught of cold water to assuage the thirst caused by the essence of maple. After all were satisfied, or we might say dissatisfied, because they were not able to dispose of any more, a programme consisting of vocal and instrumentel music, Readings, recitations &c., was very creditably carried through, and was thoroughly appreciated by those present. Proceeds over $8.

A shocking accident incident on Sabbath desecration occurred on Sunday last, on the farm of Fred Gohl. Mr. Casper Hartman had left a child 3 year of age there while he attended divine service, and during the absence of the senior members of the family a number of youths were playing ball, one of which struck it with considerable force, striking the child on the nose, literally knocking it off. Dr. McLean was immediately summoned but was able to do comparatively little for the poor child. A lifelong disfigurement is inevitable in addition to the acute suffering even if it should survive. It ought to prove a serious sermon for the ones participating in the game, and severe punishment should be meted out to them. Mr. Hartman has the sympathy of his numerous friends.—Review.

CRAZED WITH [illegible]

The Rev. George H. Pool, who lived in seclusion in Brooklyn, was attacked by small-pox in his clandestine appartments, and before he knew what was the matter, was snatched by the health board and carried off to the Flatbush hospital, where he died of the dreadful malady, and, seeming to have neither money nor friends, was buried in the Potters Field. It was subsequently ascertained that he was a minister; that he had been pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia; that he owned and had lived alone in a house in Camden, N. J., without even a servant to cook his meals.

In his Brooklyn room he lived economically, and even penuriously, having only a little oil stove over which he prepared his food. It was then rumoured that he was rich, and the Philadelphia Times has published a long list of property which it estimates to be worth $550,000. I happen to know, says a New York correspondent of an Indianapolis paper, of the shadow that was on this mans singular life. It is two years since I first met the Rev. George H. Pool in the business office of a mutual friend down town. He was a tall and erect man, but not very stately, and wore a sleek black wig. He seemed quiet and self contained. He dressed always in clerical black, and wore a cloth cloak and silk hat. His face was shallow, his expression thoughtful, and he seldom smiled. I soon learned some items of his history.

He was a Philadelphia preacher; he was rich, and he was a bachelor of fifty-five years, now in love for the first time in his life. With whom? With a friend of mine—a married woman, who has been for some years separated from her husband, but from religious scruples, was not divorced. She repelled his advances, of course, and resented his protestations, but his infatuation was complete. He declared to her friends, as also to his own, that he could never be happy, and life was not worth having unless she would get a divorce and marry him. He came on often from Philadelphia, and renewed his siege.

She was an intelegent and attractive woman, practicing her profession in this city. He persecuted her at her house, importuned her at her office, waylaid her on the street. Soon he began to neglect his church. He besought his friends to pray that the Lord would permit him to marry the object of his choice. He called a meeting of his trustees and told them that the love of the Lord had been superseded; that he was madly in love with a woman who could not marry him if she would, and would not if she could; that he would resign his charge if they wanted him to, but he would not give up the pursuit on which his hopes were set. They reasoned with him seriously, and set forth his neglect of duty, but he resigned, and came to Brooklyn last summer. He pursued here two objects, one, the lady I have spoken of, and the other, preaching the gospel among the sailors. To her, through friends, he offered everything if she would put an end to his suffering by becoming his wife. He would give her $10,000 he said; he would give $100,000 to any object she named; he would surrender to her all his property. He was a shrewed business man.

Inheriting a little money from his father, he early went West and opened two country stores, hiring men to manage then for him. He bought goods himself while preaching in Pennsylvania, and supplied the stores. He also made money in patents and in real estate, of which he owned a good deal in Kansas, Illinois, Minnesota, and Albion, Mich. He owned $80,000 worth of lots in this city. He told the story of his hopeless love to scores, perhaps to hundreds, and craved the intercession of everybody who he thought could have any influence. Very well, he said one day in despair, if she cannot love, I will her my cottage at Cape May, and $50,000 and she may give up her business and go there and live all her life, and I will never go near her. At another time he said—I would rather go back and give up all my property and be a day laborer, if that would make her mary me, even if she should never be able to walk a step or lift up her head. It seems to have been a case of unique infatuation and devotion; and his tragic end—dying in a small pox hospital, with not a friend informed of his whereabouts, and buried in the Potters Field before one of them knew that he was sick—presents a ghastly contrast. It is a waving of the yellow flag from Cupids head quarters.

Adventurous Trip.—On saturday last a resident near Wiarton named Watchorne started to move to St. Vincent, and while the father of the family came around by the way of Owen Sound with a load by waggon, the mother with six little children started on the ice by sleigh, coasting down Colpoys Bay and up to Presque Isle, where they arrived near dark. Unable to find shelter for the night they attemped to cross the bay to Leith, but missed their way in the dark, and struck the shore below Leith, with no house in sight. Here the oldest boy left his mother with the rest of the children on the shore in the bitter cold, while he went in search of a house. He soon found one, but was informed that they had no room for them, and was directed to Leith—so the half-frozen party had to go on in search of the village. Here they found there was no public house, and were directed to keep on to Annan, which they reached at midnight, and were admitted after rousing Mr. Chas. Lemon, the proprietor of the hotel there. When they got into this hospitable shelter they were nearly frozen, and could not of held out to go much farther—the mother carrying a baby only six months' old, while the rest of the children were quite young. They stayed there till morning, and then procured a waggon, arriving safely at their home in St. Vincent; but they are not likely soon to forget the experience of their trip across Owen Sound bay and losing their way in the bitter cold of last Saturday night.—O. S. Times.

Mothers who are startled at the [illegible] of midnight by that ominous hoarse cough of your little ones, what would you not give for a prompt and certain means of relief from that dread destroyer of your children, Croup? such a means you may have for the trifling cost of 25 cents. It is Hagyard's Yellow Oil, the great Household remedy for all inflammatory and painful diseases. Do not [illegible] over night again without it.

TARRED AND FEATHERED.

An [illegible] Marriage and the Extraordinary Sequel.

A correspondent at Gilboa, in the Catskill Mountains, gives the particulars of the recent tarring and feathering of Mr. and Mrs. Stephen Cantine by a party of eight masked men. Mrs. Cantine is 19 years old and her husband 22. The woman says she left her first husband on account of his drunkness, and that, being too poor to get a divorce, she and Cantine went before Justice of the Peace Shafer and were sworn together. This proceeding scandalized the neighborhood, and the couple recieved fur ther censure on account of the alleged attempt of Cantine to levy blackmail on Oscar Jackson, the village storekeeper, by charging him with trying to seduce Mrs. Catine. The woman said to the correspondent: At midnight last Wedensday we were awakened by the bursting in of the door. I saw a crowd of men coming into the kitchen. Some of them had masks on, and all of them had their faces blackened. One of the men struck my husband in the face, and then four grabbed him by his arms and legs and pulled him out on the floor and stripped him. He kept saying, Boys let me up. They threw him face down on the floor, and held him there while they put the tar and feathers on him. There were eight men in all. As soon as the first four had pulled my husband out of bed the other four seized me. Two of them held my arms down by my sides as I sat on the side of the bed. Only one man handled the tar, so I had to sit on the edge of the bed and see my husband ill-treated There was pint cups of tar. One cup-ful they used on him and the other on me. A man with mittens on dipped the mittens in the tar and spread it over my husbands body. When he had spread it all over him they put on the feathers. When they had finished with my husband they carried him to a corner of the kitchen, where two men held him on the floor. Then the other six got around me. They put me down on the floor, the same as they did him. The man with the mittens began by putting tar in my face and eyes It made my eyes smart at first and blinded me. He rubbed tar over my body. He also put on feathers. I begged them to stop. I did not dare to scream because I was afraid they might kill me. When they had finished, they cautioned us that if we made any noise or attempt to follow them they would come back and kill us. Then they left us, and all went out same way they came, leaving us lying there naked in the cold and dark. As soon as they had gone we made a fire and went to work to get the tar off. We scrubbed away all the rest of the night, and it wasn't until 9 o'clock the next morning that my husband looked well enough to go out. Then he went over to his fathers house and told what had happened. It was days before I got the tar off me. They put some in my hair, too, and that was almost impossible to get out. Several arrests were made and three men were found guilty of participating in the assult and were fined $20 a piece.

Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam is a purely vegetable healing balsam. It cures by loosening the phlegm and corrupt matter from the Lungs and expelling it from the system. Croup, Asthma, Bronchitis, Hoarseness and all pectoral diseases yield to it promptly. It costs 25 cents per bottle.

A MISTAKE.

"Mistakes will happen in the best of families."

A person with a basket on his arm, stepped into one of our shops and asked the man:

"What is the price of spring chickens?"

"Three shillings for a good one."

"Do you know my fine fellow that you made a mistake this morning when I was trading with you."

"A mistake?"

"Yes, sir; a very serious mistake."

Why, I don't remember what it was."

"A mistake, sir, that your employer would not tolerate for a moment,"

"Well, sir, what is it?"

"A mistake, sir, that would be considerable, if it had happened to any other man; but, sir, I have always made it a rule to correct mistakes, even if they are in my favor."

"For goodness sake, what's the matter?"

"I have been put to considerable trouble to rectify it; labor that I am called upon to perform as a duty under the principle that honesty is the best policy, and I hope that you will take a lesson from this event, and not repeat it in the future,"

"What is the mistake?"

"You know I purchased this morning, one dozen eggs."

"Yes"

"Well, sir, when I arrived home I discovered that you had made a mistake."

Well, what is it?"

"Instead of a dozen eggs you had put up a dozen of spring chickens"——(uncovering the basket and showing a dozen broken eggs in various stages of developement)——and as the price of spring chickens is 3s, and eggs only one penny, it makes a difference of 11d. each; and not wishing to cheat your employer, nor having any desire to go into the poultry business, I have brought them back, and will gladly change them for eggs, as I consider it only a mistake on your part."

The man took the basket and emptied the contents on the street, put in a dozen eggs, and handed the customer a cigar. The man winked out of the right eye——

"Don't say anything about this."

Customer winked out of his left—

"Oh, that's all right." (Exit.)

A PLUCKY BOY.

A PLEASANT SKETCH TO READ.

The boy marched straight up to the counter.

"Well, my little man," said the merchant complacently—he had just risen from such a glorious good dinner—"what will you have to day?"

"Oh please, sir, mayn't I do some work for you?"

It might have been the pleasant blue eyes that did it for the man was not accustomed to parley with such small gentlemen, and Tom wasn't seven yet, and small of his age at that. There were a few wisps of hair on the merchant's temples, and looking down on the little appealing face, the merchant pulled at them, gave the ends of his cravat a slight brush, and then his hands traveled down to his vest pocket.

"Do some work for me, eh? Well, now, about what sort of work might your machinery calculate to be able to perform? Why, you can't look over the counter."

"Oh, yes I can, and I'm growing, please growing very fast—there, see if I cant look over the counter."

"Yes, by standing on your toes. Are they coppered?"

"What, sir?"

"Why, your toes. Your mother couldn't keep you in shoes if they weren't."

"She can't keep me in shoes, anyhow, sir," and the voice hesitated.

The man took pains to look over the counter. It was too much for him; he couldd't see the little toes. Then he went all the way round.

"I thought I should need a microscope," he said very gravely, "but I reckon if I get close enough I can see what you look like."

"I'm older than I'm big, sir," was the neat rejoinder. "Folks say I'm very small for my age."

"And what might be your, age sir?" responded the man with great emphesis.

"I'm almost seven," said Tommie, with a look calculated to impress even six feet nine. "You see my mother hasn't anybody but me, and this morning I saw her crying because she couldn't find five cents in her pocket book, and she thinks that the boy who took the ashes stole it from her—and—I—haven't had any—breakfast, sir."

The voice again hesitated and tears came in the blue eyes.

"I recon I can help you to breakfast, my poor little fellow," said the man, feeling in his pocket. "There, will that quarter do?"

The boy shook his head sadly "Mother wouldn't let me beg, sir," was the simple reply.

"Humph! where is your father?"

"We never heard of him, sir, after he went away. He was lost, sir, in the steamer City of Boston."

"Ah! you don't say. That's bad—but your a plucky little fellow, anyhow. Let me see;" and he pondered, puckering up his mouth and looking straight down into the boy's eyes, which were looking straight up into his. "Saunders," he asked, addressing a clerk who was rolling up and writing on parcels, "is cash No. 4 still sick?"

"Dead, sir, died last night," was the low reply.

"Ah, I'm sorry to hear that. Well, here's a youngster that will take his place."

Mr. Saunders looked up slowly, then he put his pen behind his left ear, then his glance traveled curiously from Tommy to Mr. Towers.

"Oh, I understand," said the latter, "yes, he is very small, indeed, but I like his pluck. What did No. 4 get?"

"Three dollars, sir," said the still astonished clerk.

"Put this boy down four. There, youngster, give your name, and run home and tell your mother you've got a place at four dollars a week. Come back on Monday and I'll tell you what to do. Here's a dollar in advance; I'll take it out of your first week's pay. Can you remember?"

"Work, sir—work all the time!"

Tommy shot out of the shop. If ever broken stairs, that had a twist through the whole flight, cracked and trembled under the weight of a small boy, or, perhaps, as might be better stated, laughed and chuckled on account of a small boy's good luck those in the tenement house enjoyed themselves thoroughly that morning.

"I've got it, mother! I'm took! I'm cash boy! Don't you know when they take the parcels, the clerk calls 'cash!' Well, I'm that! Four dollars a week, and the man said I had real pluck—courage, you know. And here is a real dollar for breakfast; and don't you ever cry again, for I'm the man of the house now."

The house was only a 10x15 room, and how those blue eyes did magnify it. At first the mother looked—well, it passes my power to tell how she did look, as she caught the boy in her arms, and huged him and kissed him, while the tears streamed down her cheeks. But they were tears of thankfulness now.

HEART'S CONTENT.

Far, far away, 'mid purple seas,
The lonely isle I dream of lies;
Deep blue above its waving palms
Arch sunny skies.

And where a lofty sun-kissed hill
Slopes down to the shining sands,
Half hidden by its myrtle trees,
My cottage stands.

And through its pleasant halls I roam
In summer time, when days are long,
And hear above the sighing waves
A fountain's song.

For on the lawn a fountain flings
Cool spray upon my lillies white
All day, until with darkness fall
Cool dews of night.

Wide windows has my island home,
All open to the balmy air,
And many a sheltered, shady nook,
And winding stair.

Sometimes a well-loved visitor
Comes blithely thro' its friendly door,
Oh, then my heart forgets all doubt,
And asks no more.

All is our own, my love's and mine;
We reign supreme without one fear;
Our vassals are the white sea birds
And shy, wild deer.

Oh, lonely isle and blessed lot,
And happy heart beyond compare;
God grant that we may ever prove
Worthy a life so fair.

You ask where lies this paradise—
This golden land so far away?
I answer where the morning breaks
Beyond the day.

Far, far beyond the setting sun,
Whose clouds of rose and amber blent
Have caught their tint from flowers that bloom
In fadeless Heart's Content.

'Tis underneath the sky of Love,
Encircled by the sea of Dreams,
Watered by Fancy's ever clear,
Unfailing streams.

So when I watch with pensive eyes
The glory of the day's decline,
Fond thoughts, like pilgrims, journey toward
That far-off clime.

For there I see my love's dear face,
I lean my head upon his breast;
The world is wide and full of strife,
But here is rest.

Blow, cruel winds of life and fate,
Blow till your icy breath is spent;
Ye cannot mar the blessed peace
Of happy Heart's Content.

EVA KATHERINE MUNN.

IN THE MIDST OF PERIL.

By the Author of "Hidden Quicksands," "A Relentless Foe," "Maggie O'Connor's Fortunes," &c., &c.

Teddy flushed.

"Of course not"—with dignity. "Come along!'

Then they started on their walk. It proved however much too long a walk for such a child; and Surridge was feeling vexed that they had undertaken it when they at length reached the keepers lodge.

Larry Mulligan, Mr. O'Brien's gamekeeper, was a short thick-set man, with—the tutor thought—a very evil countenance. He listened sullenly to the news they brought, and muttered that it was a bad job.

'Tell the young masther, please sir,' he said 'that I will explain matters, and hope he will soon be well.'

'Would it be possible to get a convenance from here to take us back to St. Kevin's?' asked the tutor. 'I am afraid this little lad will scarcely manage to walk back.'

'Well,' replied the keeper, 'there is the masther's pony; you could have that, may be, if so be you wouldn't mind leading him and sending him it home again.'

Surridge thankfully accepted the offer; and Teddy, who felt—though he would not acknowledge it—some fatigue, brightened at the idea of a ride. The keeper set off to the stable to get the pony, and the tutor and the boy rested meanwhile in the lodge, where the buxom girl was moving about, busy with her household cars. By and by she brought Teddy a cup of milk, and, as the boy took it, Mr. surridge drew a shilling from his pocket and begged her to buy a ribbon at the fair with it. The girl looked pleased.

'Are you the gentleman who's come to live at the Piorory, sir,' she said, 'to teach Master Teddy?'

'Yes, I am?'

'Ah, well, it's safe, I hope the saints will keep you!' she responded.

'Why safe? Do you apprehend any danger?' asked the young man.

She hesitated.

'The country's sorely troubled,' she said. 'If I may give advice to the kind ladies up to the Priory, I would't if I were they, walk out of the grounds at all, at all!'

'I will tell them what you say. You know them, then.

'Do I know them? Arrah, all the country knows them! Pretty Miss Eva, and Princess Glorvina, as we call her, the flower of Erin! Why my sister lives servant at their farm. It's a hard place Kathleen has, but a dale happier than mine with ould Mulligan!'

Here she stopped somewhat abruptly, for sound of hoofs approaching told her that old Mulligan was at hand and she darted back to her work.

Surridge thanked the keeper, put Teddy on the pony, and walked beside him homeward, without seeing any one on the way. The roads were strangely deserted. In fact there was a sense of danger in the air, and it seemed as if the rush of an approaching storm were over everything.

The next few days passed without incident.

Mr. O'Brien came to see his son, and wished him to return home for his mother's nursing; but Tim, who bore pain impatiently, declared that he felt too ill to move, and remained the following day also in bed.

* * * * * *

The clergyman who officiated in the nearest Protestant church to St. Kevin' the pastor of a very small congregation recently found himself compelled—by business, he said; some thought by fear—to go to Dublin, and as he had not been able to find a substitute to do his duty, he had begged Mr. Coghlan to ask his son's tutor, when he arrived, to [illegible]. With this request the young clergyman readily complied and on the next Sunday he preached at the parish church.

The extreme refinement of his appearance was more noticeable in the white surplice than out of it; and, with some wonder, Glorvina allowed to herself that he was not "not bad lookin," and had an air of gentle dignity.

Were it not for the diffident and nervousness which hurried his delivery somewhat, she would also have thought his sermon excellent. It was on charity in its fullest and widest sense, and might have been listened to with approbation by any one.

That Sunday was the last of O'Brien's stay with them. He had lingered longer than the Doctor thought absolutely necessary, but the hospitality of the family had never suffered him to see that they were somewhat weary of his presence. For he was restless; he wandered about the house, and startled Mrs. Coghlan by appearing suddenly in strange and unexpected places; and his temper, tried probably by pain, had shown itself as morose and irritable, even to Glorvina.

Surridge had faithfully delivered the message of the keeper's servant girl to Mrs. Coghlan. She thanked him and promised that the advice should be acted on, and the young ladies confined for the present. The park was large enough to make the confinement merely nominal.

Mrs. Coghlan was daily better pleased with the tutor. Teddy had taken both to him and to his book in a surprising manner. Indeed Mr Surridge had actually rivalled Glorvina in the boy's affections. He extolled his tutor as the wisest and finest of men; and by degrees Mr. Surridge's shyness, though not his diffidence wore off, and the young man did himself justice, save with Miss Desmond. Whenever she spoke to him he grew nervous, blushed to the roots of his hair, stammered, and talked nonsense. Glorvina was partly amused partly provoked by him, and occasionaly teased him by jests and smiles, which the sensitive clergyman knew not how to interpret. Almost from the first moment he saw her he had loved her with the strong passion of a reticent and proud nature. But how hopeless seemed that love! He was of good birth, but had no fortune; for he was the youngest son of an ancient but impoverished family; and she, he soon learned, was a wealthy heiress, who might aspire to a coronet without presumption.

He told himself every day that it was madness to think of her, yet thought of her incessantly. His eyes would sometimes grow dim with tears of deep emotion when she sang to the harp some of the pathetic ballads of their country, and he belived that no one saw or noticed his feelings. But one pair of keen eyes was often on him of whom he had no suspicion or dread. Norah Coghlan was undoubtedly an infant terrible and nothing escaped her observation.

One evening, as Glorvina was singing Silent O'Moyle, the tutor's features probably expressed his emotion more strongly than usual, for Norah came up to him and said—

'Why do you sit here by yourself and sigh so? Don't you like Glorvina singing? I don't when she sings such dismal ditties. I like funny songs. Can't you sing funny songs? But of course, you can't; you are too stupid for that—aint you? I heard Glorvina say you were like a man in a play—a man called Marlow—and Eva said he couldn't say 'bo to a goose.' But you could do that couldn't you?'

Surridge murmured something unintelligible.

'Well of course you could,' Norah went on—'you are not so stupid as all that; but you are not like Captain Leicester, or even Tim.'

Teddy here interupted this pleasant monologue by dragging his sister away to look at his puppy. The sensitive clergyman was stung to the soul by the chatter of the child, which confirmed all his diffident fears.

It was true then that Glorvina rediculed him, held him up as an object of scorn. Her courtesy was only pity—condescention. She did not consider him even in the position of a friend. It was too cruel a trial

He stole out of the room to his own chambers, and did not return again to the drawing-room that evening. What had he to do amongst them—the shy, diffident lonely stranger, who had no true part in their joy or their grief?

CHAPTER V.

The young tutor could not sleep that night. The words reported by the infant terribly haunted him. Glorvina despised him, and thought him a fool. All her goodness to him, her efforts to help and cheer him, had been sacrifices of her own pleasure benefit another. There was a keen pang in knowing that she held him in contempt and that his ungraceful ways moved her mirth.

At the first dawn of the gray light of morning he rose, bressed himself and went out. Though now the middle of September, the air was not cold—only pure and bracing; and, as it played on his burning brow; it refreshed and calmed him. James Surridge was a true lover of nature. She could always comfort him in all his sorrows. He was a devout man too; and, by the time the sun began to rise, he had succeded in overcoming the agony which had been so fearful keen, and was composed, though sad. He had in the mean time passed through the lodge gate and entered a long narrow lane on one side of the main road which led towards Mr. Coghlan's home-farm. Thence the tutor could return across the meadows to the Priory by the way Teddy had shown him.

On reaching the farm, he took the road, and opened a gate, was soon in a meadow of some extent, bordered by clumps of elm trees. He had crossed two meadows, still pearly with the morning dew and redolent of the sweetness of the dawn, when he was startled by terrified screams, and, looking up, he saw a girl running at full speed, pursued by a furious bull. Surridge was close to the hedge. He tore a stake from it and rushed to save the endangered woman. Dashing sideways at the animal, he gave it a blow with his stake, which checked its course and at once turned its fury on him. But the tutor was light and nimble. He sprang to one side and avoided its onset, and, moved backward, kept it at bay with blows from his stake. Then perceiving that the girl was out of sight, he suddenly—after a crushing blow at the bull—turned and sprang over the fence which separated the meadow they were in from another. It was a leap which brought him on his face on the other side; but he was up in a moment, and, seeing that the animal was struggling frantically to force its way through the hedge after him, he ran off as fast as he could towards the farm. And now he saw, as he neared the buildings, that the alarm was given, and that several of the farm hands, armed with pitchforks were running towards him.

It was time, for the bull had torn the fence apart, and, with bleeding side, and fiercer than ever, was roaring and coming after him with head lowered and tail in the air. The laborers however interposed now with shouts and threatenings; and Surridge paused at a tolerable distance to breath.

'Why, parson, be it you?, exclaimed one of the farm hands, stopping as the others ran on. 'Sure it's the bold heart ye have to go aginst a craythur like you! And its obliged we are to you for saving our Kathleen from him.'

'The blessin' of the virgin be on you, sir!' panted Kathleen, coming forward, trembeling anb sobbing. 'I thought my last hour had come.'

'Thank Heaven for your deliverance,' said the tutor gently but solemnly, 'as indeed I ought also for mine. It was a narrow escape for both of us.'

'Ay, sure it was, your rivarance! but you had need to run the risk—and only for poor me too!'

Surridge glanced at her as she spoke—in truth, she was not gifted with the national beaty. Her face was broad, flat, and summer freckled; her bare arms and feet showed that she was of the lower orderer of the peasantry—the farm druge in fact. The farm hand noticed his glance, and exclaimed—

But sure, sir, as good a lass as ever breathed; ready to help anybody The saints bless her and you for saving her.'

Surridge nodded good-humouredly.

'I am very thankful to have been in time,' he said. 'Good morning to you. I suppose the men will secure the bull?'

'Ay, sir, Mick's got a rope around his neck now!'replied the lobuorer, looking toward the scene of the conquest. 'It's a vicious brute the carythur is! By your leave sir, I'll go past it with you. My pitchfork would be a good help if it gets loose again; and there is no telling what it may do.'

Surridge thanked him and accepted his offer, said 'good-bye,' to Kathleen and started once more on his homeward way, entering into conversation with his companion as they walked together; for with the poor whom he was used to aid and teach, James had no shyness. They understood him as he understood them.

The family were at breakfast when the tutor entered the Priory hall, and were not a little uneasy at the absence of their chaplain at prayers. Surridge apologized, but said nothing of the cause of his detention. He was to shy to relate the story of his recent prowness. But, before breakfast was over. Norah startled him with the exclamation.—

'Why, Mr. Surridge, you have a split in the back of your coat!'

Crimsoning, the young clergyman was obliged to explain that he had had an encouter with a bull, and had probably torn his garment in the struggle, and then eager questions and cross-questionings compelled him to stammer out the story of his own exploit. There was a murmur of applause as the tale closed. Teddy called out that his tutor was 'a regulad brick' and Mrs. Coghlan declared that the action was heroic.

'And I am so much obliged to you for saving poor Kathleen,' said that sweetest voice which was his heart's music, 'she is an especial favorite of mine.'

James could only blush and stammer in reply; but he felt that he was more than rewarded for risking his life that morning: and then, at a whispered hint from Glorvina Mrs. Coghlan desired Mr. Surridge to let the needlewoman, who resided in the house, have his coat to repair ot once.

'I shouldn't wonder said Norah to him in the course of the morning—'no I shouldnt' wonder at all, Mr. Surridge, if Glorvina married you. She always says she would marry the bravest man she knew, and you are very brave; and, though your coat is torn, she can buy you a new one.'

For the first time little Norah trembled at the anger which flashed from the tutor's eyes.

'How dare you child,' he cried, as she shrenk back—'how dare you? Never talk of Miss Desmond's marrying in that way. It is too much!'

Norah, terrified, retreated to cry alone, or, rather, with her doll; to whom she confided her inquires, promising her at the same time that she would tell Glorvina how cross that silly tutor was, and how he had said it would be quite dreadful to marry her! For thus Norah had understood his words.

* * * * * *

Another threatening notice on the hall door, and very diffident this time, said Mr. Coghlan, as he joined the tutor in the breakfast-room, soon after this incident; and he placed a dirty piece of paper, which he held in Surridge's hands.

The tutor took it and glanced over it. It ran thus—

'Mister Coghlan,—Ye have been warned once bekas ye helped the dirty sodiers at Callinore; but we spared ye bekas ye have ould Irish blood in yer veins. But if ye go to Dublin and bear witness against the boys who have done their duty, it's [illegible] shall and all belonging to ye. 'Captain Rock.'

'I don't quite understand to what it alludes,' said the tutor.

'Well, when they made a riot and were going to burn the town down, I read the Riot Act—being the nearest magistrate—before the soldiers fired on the mob. Some of the rioters were wounded, and two killed; but it was a pure act of self-defence on our part, I assure you, though much to be gretted. Three of the ringleaders were captured, one in the act of endeavoring to knock me off my horse with his shillelagh. I am summoned to Dublin to bear witness against him at the approaching assizes, and, unhappily, I saw him knock down and kill a helpless man who was on the side of the law and order, my evidence is sure to hang him. That is why they threatened me; but the threats, of course, can make no difference in my conduct, I must do my duty.'

BOSS FOR FIVE MINUTES.

Soon after dinner hour yesterday a specimen tramp appeared at the door of a house on John-street, and before he could be ordered off the steps, he began:

"Sir, I'm a tramp."

"Yes, I see you are."

"But I am not here to ask for food, money or clothing. I have just had a bite, my clothes are good enough, and if I had money I should get drunk and be sent out."

"Well, what do you want?"

"There are four tramps down the street and I know they will call here. It is now five years, since I began to travel around. I suppose I have been called a loafer, a thief and a deadbeat a thousand times, and I have been shot at, clubbed, broomsticked and scalded times without number. Now I want a change."

"How?"

"Well, all I ask is that you will let me represent your house when those tramps come up."

This was agreed to. He sat down on the steps, removed his hat and lighted the stub of a cigar and was reading a circular when the fellows slouched up and entered the yard.

"What in Arkansas, do you fellows want in my yard?" exclaimed the tramp, as he rose up.

"Suthen to eat," was the humble reply.

"Somethin to eat. Why you miserable, thick-ribbed cadaverers, don't you get up to work and earn it then? Do you suppose I have got nothing to do but keep a free hotel for loafers?"

"No one gives us a show," growled the third man.

"That's your cue. Nobody will take you in with your old rags and dirt and sore heels and weup over you, and ask you to please be good, put you in the parlor bedroom and feed you on chicken broth. How awful it is that you can't be put on ice and laid away where you won't melt."

"Will you give us something?" impudently demanded the fourth.

"Will I? You are just right I will? I'll give you five seconds to get out of the gate, and I'll tell you in addition that if I ever see you in this neighborhood again I'll tie you into hard knots and hire a sore eyed dog to bite you to death? Git up and git? Move on—hurry—out with you?"

They shuffled out as fast as they could, and when they had turner the corner, the tramp put on his hat, put out his inch of cigar for another smoke and said to the gentleman:

"You have done me a great favor, and I am grateful; I already feel better for the change, and I solemnly believe if I could only have got an excuse to throw them over the fence, I should have been ready to reform and start out as a lecturer! Good bye. I shall never forget your kindness."

TOO LITERAL.

There was one minister's son, now ordained—and a very faithful and useful pastor he has been—a member of a large ministerial family, who in his academic days was as full of mischief as the proverbial minister's son is supposed to be. He taxed the well-known elastic patience of the "Doctor," as the headmaster was called, to the last degree. Finally the doctor said to him, after a capital act of misconduct, "You must prepare yourself for a severe whipping." When the appointed time came, the doctor was on hand, much more affected, apparently, than the irrepressible mischief-maker. After a solemn discourse in that most melting tone of voice that no one can forget that ever hear it, the doctor drew his rattan and laid it with considerable unction upon the boy's back. Nothing but dust followed the blows. The subject of discipline was entirely at his ease, and evidently quite unconscious of the stroke. "Take off your coat, sir!" was the next command, for the doctor was a little aroused. Again whistled the rattan around the boy's shoulders, but with no more effect. "Take off your vest, sir," shouted the doctor. Off went the vest, but there was another under it. "Off with the other!" And then to the astonishment of the administrator of justice, he exposed a dried codfish, defending the back of the culprit like a shield, while below there was evidently stretching over the other exposed parts of the body a stout leather apron. "What does this mean!" said the doctor. "Why," said the great rogue, in a particularly humble and persuasive tone, "you told me, doctor, to prepare myself for punishment, and I have done the best I could." It was out of the question to pursue that act of discipline any further at that time. And it is doubtful whether it was ever resumed again.

[illegible] ...ew ... without ... hair ... out from natural causes ... again. The celebrated [illegible], who was formerly physician-in-chief of the St. Louis Hospital at Paris, and who is known throughout the world as the most learned specialist for affections of the skin, told me one day that there was nothing that could make the hair grow after the baldness had come on gradually. This I believe firmly; if there was anything of the kind, we would not see so many New York doctors with heads so completely destitute of hair as the backs of turtles. I am even persuaded that these gentlemen would follow the example of those Greek heroes who, under the leadership of Jason, made a voyage to Colchis to bring back the Golden Fleece. Modern Argonauts, the doctors, would consider themselves happy if they could bring back from such a voyage the secret of restoring the human fleece.

I don't think I am far from the truth when I say that during the past twenty-five years that I have practiced the profession of hairdresser, I have made the trial upon different bald heads of more than five hundred different hair tonics, and I am bound to admit that I never saw a single head the hair of which was restored after baldness. After so many failures, I am completely undeceived as to the value of all the preparations, and I would not now recommend any one of them, because I would be afraid to commit the crime that is designated by the words, "obtaining money under false pretenses." In my pathological studies upon the hair, I have found that people who prespire a great deal from the head are apt to get bald. The bad habit of wearing hats indoors is also very hurtful to the hair. In 1806, after the famous battle of Jena, in which the Prussians were completely defeated by Napoleon I., Baron Larrey, the celebrated military surgeon, perceived that many of the German prisoners were completely bald. Surprised, he made inquiries as to the cause of this, and he found that they owed their baldness to the shape—as homely as unhealthy—of their caps. The foul air of their head gear, having no issue, destroyed the vitality of the hair.

OUTBREAK OF CHOLERA PROBABLE

Dr. Willard Parker speaking at the New York medical meeting said: It must be understood that within a few days we shall have the heat of summer upon us, and the effect of that will be fearful. It is well to inquire what we shall do in such a case. In 1849 the last visitation of cholera broke out on the 17th of May. We have only from now to then to get this city cleaned—that is, we have only one month. If the heated weather were to come there never were so many factors for producing disease, at one time, than there are now. We want, then, a power to act at once. We have already indications of pestilence. The severe winter has enervated us, for we always find after a severe winter that we have a great deal of sickness. It is because the nervous system is so enervated by the pressure of winter that the conditions are found favorable to an outbreak of pestiience, if there is accompanied therewith a cause for pestilence. In the present circumstances of our city I think that the conditions are favorable for such an outbrake in our midst. If this should be the case it is impossible for me to say what the effect of that will be. Great guilt will be at the door of some one. I will not call it murder; I cannot call it manslaughter. It is killing, and you may call it what you choose. To guard this city against a pestilential invasion is of the first importance, for this city is a sort of key to the outside world. Pestilence or cholera is famous for travelling in broad higways, and if you have cholera it will be impossible to hedge it in this city alone for it will travel along the states, find its way to New Jersey and the New England States, and thus disseminate itself over every part of the Union. The number of deaths in 1832 from the cholera was about twenty thousand; in 1849 the number was about fourteen thousand. Prevention is better than cure.

MISS COLE'S TEETH

FOURTEEN OF THEM TRAVELLING AROUND ALL OVER HER BODY.

A most remarkable story comes from Middletown, Orange county, N. Y. A maiden lady at that place on the 5th of January, 1869, swallowed a new set of false teeth, which became separated from the rubber mould in which they had been set, while masticating her food. Before she could eject the food from her mouth the teeth had gone down into her stomach. The family physician was summoned, but all his efforts were unavailing. The teeth caused her no discomfort, and in a short time the matter was entirely forgotten. A few days ago Miss Cole, the lady in question, felt a sharp pain near her left shoulder, and upon examining the spot found what appeared like a wen under the skin. With the aid of a penknife she extracted a hard sudstance, which proved to be a tooth. She was at a loss to know how the tooth come in such an unusual spot till she suddenly recollected that she had, twelve years ago, swallowed her set of teeth. During the past four days the lady has been cutting teeth all over her body and had, at last accounts, recovered twelve of the fourteen teeth that had formerly constituted her full set. She is axiously awaiting the arrival of the other two. She has placed the teeth in a glass case and will keep them as mementoes.

THE ROAD TO BE HANDED OVER.—The arrangements have been made for the widening of the gauge of the Toronto, Grey & Bruce Railway this summer, to be completed by the time the fall trade commences. The road will then be handed over to the Grand Trunk, who lease it for twenty years. The municipalities who voted bonuses to the road will now be called upon to hand over the moneys so voted to the present company. When the improvements contemplated are made, this section of the country will have better railway facilities than many parts of the Province.—Gazette.

EARL BEACONSFIELD.—Obsequies to place on the 26th inst., at Hughenden members of the Royal Family, Ministers, and ex-Ministers, with the exception, of Hon. Mr. whose Gladstone, created con-siderable absence comment.

A CASE of considerable interest was tried on Wednesday last at the "Revere House," in our Town, before Messrs. Brown, Black, and Struthers, J. P.'s, in which Mr. Thomas Sullivan, of Glenelg, was indicted for perjury, and although eleven witnesses gave evidence on behalf of the prosecutor, Mr. Sullivan was honorably acquitted of the serious charge. Mr. J. D. McMillan appeared for the prosecutor, while the accused was defended by Mr. D. F. MacMillan.

THE latest novelty in American, Jewlety, at W. F. Doll's Flesherton and Dundalk.

THE weather is all that could be desired by farmers. There has been this week two very fine, and much needed showers of rain, and vegetation is now well advanced for the season of the year. There is considerable grain sown in this section of country, and if the weather continues fine the seeding will be finished in good time. We fear the greater part of the fall wheat is a complete failure, still we think it wise to leave it say to the 5th May, and if there is then a reasonable prospect for half a crop, don't plough it up; it would be as safe as other grain taking into consideration the extra labor and seed; but if it is deemed wise to plough up then sow to Barley.

CROQUET Sets, Lacrosse Sticks, &c., at Doll's Flesherton.

Mr. Wm. Hendrie [illegible] a letter to the Mail, states the rumour that the T. G. & B Railway is to be handed over to the Grand Trunk as premature. He states that he has succeeded in obtaining a much more favorable offer than that of the Grand Trunk and call upon the people of Toronto, whom he says [illegible] interested in the matter, to assist him in urging the Directors [illegible] the Grand Trunk Scheme. The municipalities in this section of country, who voted bonuses did so under the distinct understanding that the Road was to be leased to the Grand Trunk, and we doubt much whether they will be parties to any other arrangements.

To HAVE your watches repaired properly take it to W. F. Doll, Flesherton. Satisfaction guaranteed.

AN OLD SETTLER GONE.—We regret to have to announce this week the death of James Knott, Esq., of Euphrasia. He was one of the earliest settlers of that Township and his departure will be mourned by a large circle of friends and relatives. He became a resident of that Township 33 years ago, and by indomitable perseverance and industry, hewed out for himself one of the most beautiful homes in the county, and was respected by all. He was for years a member of the Township Council, and was its first Deputy Reeve, and father of the ex-Reeve, Mr. E. E. Knott. No one who had the pleasure of his acquaintance but will regret to hear of his demise.

W. F. DOLL, of Flesherton, has just recived a beautiful line of 10, 12 and 15k collored ann Bright Gold Chains, Necklets, Sockets, &c., direct from the factory.

The show of General Purpose Horses was very fair, but that of Heavy Draft was not as good as previous years. A number of Bulls were shown of a suprior e breed. We notice one young bull aged 13 months, owned by Mr. A. C. Beattie, which is a very fine animal and well deserving of a prize. The following is the list of prizes awarded:

PRICEVILLE.

From a Correspondent.

THE most notable point here just now is the absence of any great commotion, except among the rural population, who are trying to make up for the lateness of the spring by working early and late.

We are stepping a little ahead of the neighboring villages here in regard to educational accommodation, as a new school house, built with all the latest improvements, both in style and convenience, is on the tapis. The tender accepted was $2,3000.

It is rumored that a brick-yard is to be started shortly in the vicinity of the village.

As [illegible] I think there is great need of some kind of society by which our young men could find some way of passing their evenings to better advantage than at present. It is a well known fact that the want of employment is one of the most frequent causes of vice, especially among the young. The most of our villages can boast of some kind of general improvement society, and whether in some state they only go there to spark, I think, nevertheless, that is far preferable to standing around taverns and street-corners, and passing remarks on all passers-by. There was some attempt to furnish some literary entertainment in the shape of a Reading Society, but I am sorry to say it fell through.

SURROUNDED BY VENOMOUS SERPENTS.

READ the following, and then say whether we have no heroines.

A young lady of Glenelg, being charmed by the return of that welcome visitor, who has just burst the congealed bands of a northern winter, determined to enjoy the respiration of a balmy atmosphere and bask in the rays helios, then shining in his meridian of splendor. With this intent she betook herself to her wonted resort, and after comfortably seating herself, she began to draw with her far reaching fancy the depth of meaning and the beauties of expression from the pages of Shakespeare. While thus engaged she raised her eyes from the book to ponder on the passage, when to her horror she beheld a dark venomous looking serpent (one of a species of the adder) lying in a coil at her feet. Uttering a frantic scream she sprang to her feet, and sought safety in an opposite direction, but alas! her cry and movement disturbed the baskers and to her troubled brain it appeared as if she were bounded by one writhing mass, but her feeling of timidity subsided as fast as it had arisen, and seizing a missile with the determination of a Joan of Arc, she fearlessly began the work of execution, and when the task was finished, there covered the spot no less than thirteen of those venomous reptiles, each over two and a half feet in length. When this heroine could find no more victims, like Alex.'r the Great, she sat down and wept.

We would just add that the ladies of Glenelg must be possessed of large destructiveness. Young men, take warning in time.

OWEN SOUND, April 26.—A man named Jas. McLaren, a carpenter by trade, attempted suicide to-day by taking a dose of laudanum. For some years past he has been involved in somewhat compicated domestic troubles with a neighbor. This morning he proceeded to a drug store in town and procured an ounce of laudanum. he had no sooner taken the drug than a member of the family ran and called in some of the neighbours. A doctor was hurridly sent for and administered the necessary remidies, which were successful. McLaren offered resistance to taking the remedies, and expressed his determination to repeat the dose at some futer time.

Mothers who are startled at the our of midnight by that ominous hoarse cough of your little ones, what would you not give for a prompt and certain means of relief from that dread destroyer of your children, Group? such a means you may have for the trifling cost of 25 cents. It is Hagyard's Yellow Oil, the great Household remedy for all inflammatory and painful diseases. Do not rest over night again without it.

All persons who have an orchard should go over it carefully now, cutting all twigs off which have the eggs of the tent-caterpillars deposited on them. They can now be detected by careful observation, and for the benefit of those who do not know them we will give a slight description of them. They are of a dark grey color, almost brown, resembling the bark of the tree, and form a ring, generally about half an inch long, which completely encircles the twig on which they are deposited, and as the warm weather approaches this grows somewhat larger. All old trees which have loose bark would be benefitted by scraping the body and large limbs with a hoe, being careful not to injure the lower bark; after which they should be washed with lye or diluted soft soap. Young trees which have smooth bark do not need scraping, but the washing would do them good. If you desire a heavy crops of fruit you must keep the land rich on which the trees are planted. They produce better and are less liable to disease.—Farmer's Advocate.

A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune says:—"I should like to tell my fellow-readers of an experiment which I have tried. It is a protection against trunk-boring and root sucking insects affected by simply making a little gutter round the collar of the tree and pouring from a gill to a pint or more of gas-tar into it. No ill effects have followed in any known case through several years' use in several distinct places; even when applied, as it usually has been, in the warm, growing summer time, before the insects deposit their eggs. On the contrary, a deeper green and greater vigor have followed the application, showing that it probably bars off the germs of even more minute and insidious devastators than the visible insects.

The following is from a writer in the London Garden: "In Covent Garden I heard a very good account of Canadian apples, and was surprised to learn they were beating the American produce out of the field. There seems some reason for this, as the Canadian apples are better packed; the American barrels are usually "topped up," in market parlance—a layer or two of good fruit at the top, and then fruit of a poor quality below. On the other hand, the Canadian fruit is generally fairly good throughout, the barrels are well packed, and considerably larger than those of the Americans. A very excellent apple which has been coming in large quantities is the Golden Russet; it has a high and rich flavor. In some sales lately, Canadians, when compared with Americans, were in the proportions of over six to one. This must be encouraging to the Canadians, and should teach the Americans to pack honestly if they wish to keep their trade."

An additional inducement to see that trees are maintained in free-growing health exists in the fact, brought prominently forward at a Massachusetts farmer's meeting, that the fruit from diseased trees will not keep. To which might be added that so long as it does keep it is inferior in flavor and juiciness. Unfortunately, a tree is like a pig in one respect—it is very difficult to cure when once sickened. The most frequent cause of disease is the disruptive effect of untimely or violent frost. This is remediable only in one way, and that is the preventive course of only planting varieties with constitutions capable of withstanding even so severe a winter as the present. Much may be done, however, with less ironclad sorts, by care to avoid any check of growth during the proper growing season; by encouraging early and even growth so that it may be completed before autumnal frosts, and by taking measures to keep the roots from being gorged with wet while the trees are leafless and the tops from being so parched and shrivelled by winter winds as to be incapable of [illegible] supplies when they are wanted.

A NOTE OF WARNING.—The present winter has been one remarkably adapted to the welfare of insect life, and it will not be strange if our common insect pests should be more than usually abundant during the coming summer. The open winter of a year ago, with its frequent thawing and freezing, seemed to have a marked influence on the abundance of insects, as last summer was particularly noticeable for their scarcity. Doubtless other conditions render the working of this rule, (or what seemed at least to be a rule,) variable, but still it may be worth remembering, for though we cannot control the weather, we may be "fore warned," and so keep on guard in order to apply the proper checks upon the first appearance of noxious insects, when they may be expected in abundance; or on the other hand, enjoy some sense of security when we consider that an open winter has killed off many of them.

A BURIED CITY IN ALGIERS.

French newspapers report the discovery in Algiers, by the archæologist M. Tarry, of a city which had been entombed in the sand. M. Tarry's attention had been awakened by the mound-like appearance of the sandy soil, and some digging brought to light the minarets and upper portion of a mosque. Further excavations laid bare a terrace, a tower, and about a dozen houses, all in excellent preservation. He reported his discovery to the Government of Algiers, which has undertaken to have the site thoroughly explored. The place is in the southern part of the province, not far from the town of Ouargla, and exposed to the full blast of the sandy winds from the desert. Probably a succession of siroccos bearing clouds of sand completely filled up the streets and houses, making the town uninhabitable, and so drove out the population. At present there is no ground for conjecture as to the date of the occurrence.

A family table ought to be bright and cheerful, a sort of domestic altar, where every one casts down his or her offering, great or small, pleasantness or peace; where, for at least a brief space in the day, all annoyances are laid aside, all stormy tempers hushed, all quarrels healed; every one being glad and content to sit down at the same board and the same bread and salt, making it, whether it were a repast or a dinner of herbs, equally a joyful, almost a sacramental meal.

Division Court in Dufferin Hall, Markdale, 10th June, to commence at 11.30 o'clock.

A FEW FACTS FOR CANADIANS TO REMEMBER.

A correspondent of the New York Tribune, travelling in Texas writes:—In some large districts of the State, though the soil is of good quality, it is of so scant depth—the stone being everywhere so near the surface—that it dries out entirely early in the summer, and the grass dries up or is changed to hay, and only such crops can be grown that will ripen in a short season. I saw some prosperous "model farms," as the land agents call them, in various parts of Texas, on which nearly everything is grown that anybody need wish to produce here. But it should be observed that this is usually accomplished by an unlimited use of costly fertilizers, which the farm itself does not pay for, most of these places being the property of men whose wealth is acquired in other pursuits. Even on these farms the crops often fail on account of drouth. In a region so vast as this State scarcely anything can be affirmed of it as a whole. I find myself not quite able to agree with all the accounts and estimates of the gentlemen who have land to sell in Texas. Their eulogies of the agricultural capabilities of the State appear to me somewhat extravagant. But there is a great deal of land in the State which I did not see, and I do not pretend to say what its quality may be.

People intending to emigrate to this State to farm should come first to see it, or send some competent person to look at the country during the latter part of the summer. Any observant farmer can at that time of the year judge pretty well about the fitness of the soil and climate for his pursuits and interests. It is significant to observe that the land agents urge people to select their locality "before they come" to the State. One of the great railroad corporations advertises to the effect that it is better for immigrants to decide where they wish to go before they leave their old homes, as they can make a better selection then than if they wait to see the country; and the land agents say that if people begin to look around for a better part of the State they are never satisfied. The farmers all through Texas say that the reason of their not using "vegetables" more than they do is the fact that vegetables will not "keep" in this climate, and there is only a short season in the spring when "garden stuff" is available for food. They have plenty of it then, but it soon becomes too dry and hot for later planting to do any good. Potatoes are not good unless eaten when they "first come," and the sun soon cooks cabbage in the field, or the worms eat them. The reason they live mostly on bread and bacon is because nothing else will "keep" without excessive trouble and expense. All this is only what the people themselve told me; I cannot say, from my own observation, that it is true. It does not apply so fully to Northern Texas, where the climate is much cooler than in the central and southern regions of the State.

The temperature is very variable and uncertain almost everywhere in Texas, this State being especially exposed to sudden and severe storms of wind from the north, during which the temperature falls with frightful rapidity—a few hours sufficing for a change from almost tropical heat to cold that seems to pierce to the very marrow. The northern portion of the State is scourged by pneumonia, diphtheria, and kindred diseases. Large portions of the South, indeed, suffer greatly from these maladies. I saw a woman on the cars yesterday who was on her way back to her old home in Georgia, after living some ten years in Texas. Her husband was "a Baptist preacher," she told me, and in one of the great storms of the past winter he went away to preach at a school-house not far from their home. The weather increased in severity till "the wind turned everything to ice." The poor man's feet and legs were frozen so badly, and he was so greatly prostrated, that it was decided that amputation would not save his life. He lingered for a few weeks, and died. Of course the winter just closing has been one of extraordinary severity, but an old Texan said to me yesterday: "Young man, ye kin bet yer life 'taint safe to fool with this climate." And he added: "Ef ye've got anything warm, for outside or inside, take it along. Ye may need it afore night."

CURED BY PRAYER.

It is now more than a week since Miss Addie M. Goodrich, of Narval, in the state of Illinois, decided to stop taking medicine and trust wholly to prayer. Miss Goodrich, who has been bedridden for years, is a devout Methodist, and some days ago a friend read to her from the New Testament the story of a miraculous cure, and then prayed that she, too, might be healed. As the words were uttered, Miss Goodrich affirms that she felt a sudden accession of strength and a desire to rise from the bed, but her friends dissuaded her. Then she redoubled her prayers for health and got all her pious friends to pray for her. Finally, her doctor told her to pray for strength to get out of bed the next morning, assuring her of his confidence that the prayer would be answered. With this encouragement, she prayed continuously until the morning arrived, and with it the doctor. He prayed, and a sister prayed, and then Miss Goodrich got up, exclaiming, "Saviour, give me strength!" and walked to the chair—for the first time in nearly four years. Ever since she has been growing stronger and the neighbours look at her with awe. Her own firm belief is that she has been supernaturally cured and the singular feature of the case is that the attendant physician agrees with her.

A Kentucky preacher rose to speak, and opened the Bible. The first verse that met his eyes happened to be, "The voice of the turtle shall be heard in the land." "Brethren," said he, "at first sight one would not think their was much in this text; but, on a little consideration, you will see, there's a great deal in it. Now you, all Know what a turtle is. If you've been along by a pond you have seen them sitting on a log sunning themselves. Now, it is said, 'The voice of the turtle shall be heard in the land.' But the turtle hasn't any voice that anybody ever heard, so it must be the noise he makes in plunging off the log into the water. Hence, we must conclude that immersion is meant, and that immersion will become universal.

The remarks made by parrots, apparently with pertinence, are sometimes grotesque and astounding—as in the story told of a parrot who was present on board ship during very bad weather, when the sailors knelt on deck in a circle to pray for deliverance. The parrot watched their movements no doubt, for he correctly remembered the circumstance. It is said the captain came up from the cabin, where he had been to examine the chart, while the men were at prayer, and cried aloud: "Leave off praying, you lubbers, and get to the pumps, we're nearing land!" On arriving in port, Polly was sold to a clergyman, and in due course was placed in the vicar's dining-room. The first morning after his arrival there, he saw the servants come into the room one after another and kneel down to prayers with the family. Polly's memory instantly reverted to the scene on board ship, and he cried out with a loud voice: "Leave off praying, you lubbers, and get to the pumps! we're nearing land!" A bombshell in falling among these devout persons could not have put them into a great consternation than they were put by this irreverent exclamation.—Animal World.

Winnipeg Times: "Wheat at Pembina, Dakota, is 72 cents; at West Lynn, Manitoba, it is 90 cents. The towns are only a mile or two apart—but the international boundary line is between them. So that farmers north of the 49th parallel are in a far better position than their neighbors to the south, not only as regards prices but also in respect to the much larger average production per acre of Manitoba lands.

Does a man ever go into a grocery store and say, 'I'll give you five cents a pound for sugar,' and expect to be treated with respect? Not at all. He asks the price of sugar and pays what is asked or goes without. But the same man will offer a price twenty per cent below rates, for a given space in the advertising columns of a newspaper, and feels offended because it is not taken.—New Haven Register.

Sarsaparilla

Is a compound of the virtues of sarsaparilla, stillingia, mandrake, yellow dock, with the iodide of potash and iron, all powerful blood-making, blood-cleansing, and life-sustaining elements. It is the purest, safest, and most effectual alterative medicine known or available to the public. The sciences of medicine and chemistry have never produced so valuable a remedy, nor one so potent to cure all diseases resulting from impure blood. It cures Scrofula and all scrofulous diseases, Erysipelas, Rose, or St. Anthony's Fire, Pimples and Face-grubs, Pustules, Blotches, Boils, Tumors, Tetter, Humors, Salt Rheum, Scald-head, Ring-worm, Ulcers, Sores, Rheumatism, Mercurial Disease, Neuralgia, Female Weaknesses and Irregularities, Jaundice, Affections of the Liver, Dyspepsia, Emaciation, and General Debility.

By its searching and cleansing qualities it purges out the foul corruptions which contaminate the blood and cause derangement and decay. It stimulates and enlivens the vital functions, promotes energy and strength, restores and preserves health, and infuses new life and vigor throughout the whole system. No sufferer from any disease which arises from impurity of the blood need despair who will give AYER'S SARSAPARILLA a fair trial.

It is folly to experiment with the numerous low-priced mixtures, of cheap materials, and without medicinal virtues, offered as blood-purifiers, while disease becomes more firmly seated. AYER'S SARSAPARILLA is a medicine of such concentrated curative power, that it is by far the best, cheapest, and most reliable blood-purifier known. Physicians know its composition, and prescribe it. It has been widely used for forty years, and has won the unqualified confidence of millions whom it has benefited.

FARM AND GARDEN.

All persons who have an orchard should go over it carefully now, cutting all twigs off which have the eggs of the tent-caterpillars deposited on them. They can now be detected by careful observation, and for the benefit of those who do not know them we will give a slight description of them. They are of a dark grey color, almost brown, resembling the bark of the tree, and form a ring, generally about half an inch long, which completely encircles the twig on which they are deposited, and as the warm weather approaches this grows somewhat larger. All old trees which have loose bark would be benefitted by scraping the body and large limbs with a hoe, being careful not to injure the lower bark; after which they should be washed with lye or diluted soft soap. Young trees which have smooth bark do not need scraping, but the washing would do them good. If you desire a heavy crops of fruit you must keep the land rich on which the trees are planted. They produce better and are less liable to disease.—Farmer's Advocate.

A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune says:—"I should like to tell my fellow-readers of an experiment which I have tried. It is a protection against trunk-boring and root sucking insects affected by simply making a little gutter round the collar of the tree and pouring from a gill to a pint or more of gas-tar into it. No ill effects have followed in any known case through several years' use in several distinct places; even when applied, as it usually has been, in the warm, growing summer time, before the insects deposit their eggs. On the contrary, a deeper green and greater vigor have followed the application, showing that it probably bars off the germs of even more minute and insidious devastators than the visible insects.

The following is from a writer in the London Garden: "In Covent Garden I heard a very good account of Canadian apples, and was surprised to learn they were beating the American produce out of the field. There seems some reason for this, as the Canadian apples are better packed; the American barrels are usually "topped up," in market parlance—a layer or two of good fruit at the top, and then fruit of a poor quality below. On the other hand, the Canadian fruit is generally fairly good throughout, the barrels are well packed, and considerably larger than those of the Americans. A very excellent apple which has been coming in large quantities is the Golden Russet; it has a high and rich flavor. In some sales lately, Canadians, when compared with Americans, were in the proportions of over six to one. This must be encouraging to the Canadians, and should teach the Americans to pack honestly if they wish to keep their trade."

An additional inducement to see that trees are maintained in free-growing health exists in the fact, brought prominently forward at a Massachusetts farmer's meeting, that the fruit from diseased trees will not keep. To which might be added that so long as it does keep it is inferior in flavor and juiciness. Unfortunately, a tree is like a pig in one respect—it is very difficult to cure when once sickened. The most frequent cause of disease is the disruptive effect of untimely or violent frost. This is remediable only in one way, and that is the preventive course of only planting varieties with constitutions capable of withstanding even so severe a winter as the present. Much may be done, however, with less ironclad sorts, by care to avoid any check of growth during the proper growing season; by encouraging early and even growth so that it may be completed before autumnal frosts, and by taking measures to keep the roots from being gorged with wet while the trees are leafless and the tops from being scarched and shrivelled by winter winds as to be incapable of freely [illegible] supplies when they are wanted.

A NOTE OF WARNING.—The present winter has been one remarkably adapted to the welfare of insect life, and it will not be strange if our common insect pests should be more than usually abundant during the coming summer. The open winter of a year ago, with its frequent thawing and freezing, seemed to have a marked influence on the abundance of insects, as last summer was particularly noticeable for their scarcity. Doubtless other conditions render the working of this rule, (or what seemed at least to be a rule,) variable, but still it may be worth remembering, for though we cannot control the weather, we may be "fore warned," and so keep on guard in order to apply the proper checks upon the first appearance of noxious insects, when they may be expected in abundance; or on the other hand, enjoy some sense of security when we consider that an open winter has killed off many of them.

A BURIED CITY IN ALGIERS.

French newspapers report the discovery in Algiers, by the archæologist M. Tarry, of a city which had been entombed in the sand. M. Tarry's attention had been awakened by the mound-like appearance of the sandy soil, and some digging brought to light the minarets and upper portion of a mosque. Further excavations laid bare a terrace, a tower, and about a dozen houses, all in excellent preservation. He reported his discovery to the Government of Algiers, which has undertaken to have the site thoroughly explored. The place is in the southern part of the province, not far from the town of Ouargla, and exposed to the full blast of the sandy winds from the desert. Probably a succession of siroccos bearing clouds of sand completely filled up the streets and houses, making the town uninhabitable, and so drove out the population. At present there is no ground for conjecture as to the date of the occurrence.

A family table ought to be bright and cheerful, a sort of domestic altar, where every one casts down his or her offering, great or small, pleasantness or peace; where, for at least a brief space in the day, all annoyances are laid aside, all stormy tempers hushed, all quarrels healed; every one being glad and content to sit down at the same board and the same bread and salt, making it, whether it were a repast or a dinner of herbs, equally a joyful, almost a sacramental meal.

LIFE IN TEXAS.

A FEW FACTS FOR CANADIANS TO REMEMBER.

A correspondent of the New York Tribune travelling in Texas writes:—In some large districts of the State, though the soil is of good quality, it is of so scant depth—the stone being everywhere so near the surface—that it dries out entirely early in the summer, and the grass dries up or is changed to hay, and only such crops can be grown that will ripen in a short season. I saw some prosperous "model farms," as the land agents call them, in various parts of Texas, on which nearly everything is grown that anybody need wish to produce here. But it should be observed that this is usually accomplished by an unlimited use of costly fertilizers, which the farm itself does not pay for, most of these places being the property of men whose wealth is acquired in other pursuits. Even on these farms the crops often fail on account of drouth. In a region so vast as this State scarcely anything can be affirmed of it as a whole. I find myself not quite able to agree with all the accounts and estimates of the gentlemen who have land to sell in Texas. Their eulogies of the agricultural capabilities of the State appear to me somewhat extravagant. But there is a great deal of land in the State which I did not see, and I do not pretend to say what its quality may be.

People intending to emigrate to this State to farm should come first to see it, or send some competent person to look at the country during the latter part of the summer. Any observant farmer can at that time of the year judge pretty well about the fitness of the soil and climate for his pursuits and interests. It is significant to observe that the land agents urge people to select their locality "before they come" to the State. One of the great railroad corporations advertises to the effect that it is better for immigrants to decide where they wish to go before they leave their old homes, as they can make a better selection then than if they wait to see the country; and the land agents say that if people begin to look around for a better part of the State they are never satisfied. The farmers all through Texas say that the reason of their not using "vegetables" more than they do is the fact that vegetables will not "keep" in this climate, and there is only a short season in the spring when "garden stuff" is available for food. They have plenty of it then, but it soon becomes too dry and hot for later planting to do any good. Potatoes are not good unless eaten when they "first come," and the sun soon cooks cabbage in the field, or the worms eat them. The reason they live mostly on bread and bacon is because nothing else will "keep" without excessive trouble and expense. All this is only what the people themselve told me; I cannot say, from my own observation, that it is true. It does not apply so fully to Northern Texas, where the climate is much cooler than in the central and southern regions of the State.

The temperature is very variable and uncertain almost everywhere in Texas, this State being especially exposed to sudden and severe storms of wind from the north, during which the temperature falls with frightful rapidity—a few hours sufficing for a change from almost tropical heat to cold that seems to pierce to the very marrow. The northern portion of the State is scourged by pneumonia, diphtheria, and kindred diseases. Large portions of the South, indeed, suffer greatly from these maladies. I saw a woman on the cars yesterday who was on her way back to her old home in Georgia, after living some ten years in Texas. Her husband was "a Baptist preacher," she told me, and in one of the great storms of the past winter he went away to preach at a schoolhouse not far from their home. The weather increased in severity till "the wind turned everything to ice." The poor man's feet and legs were frozen so badly, and he was so greatly prostrated, that it was decided that amputation would not save his life. He lingered for a few weeks, and died. Of course the winter just closing has been one of extraordinary severity, but an old Texan said to me yesterday: "Young man, ye kin bet yer life 'taint safe to fool with this climate." And he added: "Ef ye've got anything warm, for outside or inside, take it along. Ye may need it afore night."

CURED BY PRAYER.

It is now more than a week since Miss Addie M. Goodrich, of Narval, in the state of Illinois, decided to stop taking medicine and trust wholly to prayer. Miss Goodrich, who has been bedridden for years, is a devout Methodist, and some days ago a friend read to her from the New Testament the story of a miraculous cure, and then prayed that she, too, might be healed. As the words were uttered, Miss Goodrich affirms that she felt a sudden accession of strength and a desire to rise from the bed, but her friends dissuaded her. Then she redoubled her prayers for health and got all her pious friends to pray for her. Finally, her doctor told her to pray for strength to get out of bed the next morning, assuring her of his confidence that the prayer would be answered. With this encouragement, she prayed continuously until the morning arrived, and with it the doctor. He prayed, and a sister prayed, and then Miss Goodrich got up, exclaiming, "Saviour, give me strength!" and walked to the chair—for the first time in nearly four years. Ever since she has been growing stronger and the neighbours look at her with awe. Her own firm belief is that she has been supernaturally cured and the singular feature of the case is that the attendant physician agrees with her.

A Kentucky preacher rose to speak, and opened the Bible. The first verse that met his eyes happened to be, "The voice of the turtle shall be heard in the land." "Brethren," said he, "at first sight one would not think their was much in this text; but, on a little consideration, you will see, there's a great deal in it. Now you, all know what a turtle is. If you've been along by a pond you have seen them sitting on a log sunning themselves. Now, it is said, 'The voice of the turtle shall be heard in the land.' But the turtle hasn't any voice that anybody ever heard; so it must be the noise he makes in plunging off the log into the water. Hence, we must conclude that immersion is meant, and that immersion will become universal."

A PARROT STORY.

The remarks made by parrots, apparently with pertinence, are sometimes grotesque and astounding—as in the story told of a parrot who was present on board ship during very bad weather, when the sailors knelt on deck in a circle to pray for deliverance. The parrot watched their movements no doubt, for he correctly remembered the circumstance. This said the captain came up from the cabin, where he had been to examine the chart, while the men were at prayer, and cried aloud: "Leave off praying, you lubbers, and get to the pumps, we're nearing land!" On arriving in port, Polly was sold to a clergyman, and in due course was placed in the vicar's dining-room. The first morning after his arrival there, he saw the servants come into the room one after another and kneel down to prayers with the family. Polly's memory instantly reverted to the scene on board ship, and he cried out with a loud voice: "Leave off praying, you lubbers, and get to the pumps! we're nearing land!" A bombshell in falling among these devout persons could not have put them into a great consternation than they were put by this irreverent exclamation.—Animal World.

Winnipeg Times: "Wheat at Pembina, Dakota, is 72 cents; at West Lynn, Manitoba, it is 90 cents. The towns are only a mile or two apart—but the international boundary line is between them. So that farmers north of the 49th parallel are in a far better position than their neighbors to the south, not only as regards prices but also in respect to the much larger average production per acre of Manitoba lands.

Does a man ever go into a grocery store and say, 'I'll give you five cents a pound for sugar,' and expect to be treated with respect? Not at all. He asks the price of sugar and pays what is asked or goes without. But the same man will offer a price twenty per cent below rates, for a given space in the advertising columns of a newspaper, and feels offended because it is not taken.—New Haven Register.

Is a compound of the virtues of sarsaparilla, stillingia, mandrake, yellow dock, with the iodide of potash and iron, all powerful blood-making, blood-cleansing, and life-sustaining elements. It is the purest, safest, and most effectual alterative medicine known or available to the public. The sciences of medicine and chemistry have never produced so valuable a remedy, nor one so potent to cure all diseases resulting from impure blood. It cures Scrofula and all scrofulous diseases, Erysipelas, Rose, or St. Anthony's Fire, Pimples and Face-grubs, Pustules, Blotches, Boils, Tumors, Tetter, Humors, Salt Rheum, Scald-head, Ring-worm, Ulcers, Sores, Rheumatism, Mercurial Disease, Neuralgia, Female Weaknesses and Irregularities, Jaundice, Affections of the Liver, Dyspepsia, Emaciation, and General Debility.

By its searching and cleansing qualities it purges out the foul corruptions which contaminate the blood and cause derangement and decay. It stimulates and enlivens the vital functions, promotes energy and strength, restores and preserves health, and infuses new life and vigor throughout the whole system. No sufferer from any disease which arises from impurity of the blood need despair who will give AYER'S SARSAPARILLA a fair trial.

It is folly to experiment with the numerous low-priced mixtures, of cheap materials, and without medicinal virtues, offered as blood-purifiers, while disease becomes more firmly seated. AYER'S SARSAPARILLA is a medicine of such concentrated curative power, that it is by far the best, cheapest, and most reliable blood-purifier known. Physicians know its composition, and prescribe it. It has been widely used for forty years, and has won the unqualified confidence of millions whom it has benefited.

THE MOONLIGHT TEXT.

BY [illegible] C. CLAY.

Only the moonlight, pale and still
Looks in on the desolate place,
Only the moonlight, cold, white, dead
Touching the dead white face;
And the moonlight throws quaint silver bars
Across the broken door,
And is peeping in at the attic roof
And creeping in at the door;

There's only a broken table and chair,
And a lamp that has flickered out,
While the cobwebs swing from the blackened roof,
And the shadows flight about.
But the cobwebs hang in the mystic light
Fairy castles of silvery thread,
And the shadows slip away from sight
At the moonbeam's silent tread.

Something they give of its girlish grace
To the frail, worn form on the bed,
And touch with wonderous beauty the face—
The haggard face of the dead,
'Tis a beauty akin to that it wore
In the years that seemed so long,
When the future held all things in store,
And life was a beautiful song.

Dead! and alone—with no human eye
To drop a pitying tear;
Dead! and alone—with no kindly hand
To smooth the tangled hair.
A glint of gold is holding still
For all the years of woe,
And it catches the gleam of the moonlight still,
As it falls to the floor below.

What is it the moon's white fingers touch
As they grope o'er the dingy floor?
A book—and open, just as it dropped
From the hand that can close no more.
Only one sentence is shining forth;
But it gleams in letters of light:—
"Though thy sins shall be like scarlet,
As wool I will make them white."

IN THE MIDST OF PERIL.

By the Author of "Hidden Quicksands," "A Relentless Foe," "Maggie O'Connor's Fortunes," &c., &c.

'For your sake any one would dare it,' he answered; then, startled at his own presumption, he blushed and turned away, forgetting politenees in his confusion and passing through the door before the lady.

'Any one would think I was a banshee,' she said to herself with a smile; but she would not notice her companion's confusion; and they parted amicably at the door of the north room.

Her remark however about the difficulties of escape rather haunted him. Would it be well to provide against it? But there was no hurry at preasent. That evening he read aloud to them one of those marvellous fictions which still deligted the world, and they forgot in it the Whiteboy's warnings and even the fate of Dan O'Rourke.

The following afternoon Captain Leicester called, and they walked in the grounds, the tutor seeing little of his beautiful enchantress.

The next day Tim O'Brien came in at dinner-time, and remained till the short day was drawing in. As he was leaving by the avenue, he met the tutor returning from the lodge, where he han been to see if any newspapers had arrived, as they sometime did in the afternoon. At Tim's request, he turned and walked back up the avenue with him.

'Surridge,' said O'Priens pausing, 'there is a rumor in the town that O'Rourke is condemned! Have you heard of it?'

'No indeed, I have not! I hope you said nothing of it in the house?'

'No, I thought it best not to do so. I fear the peopfe will be infuriated by it. It was Coghlan's testimony that hung him.'

'I suppose so; but itwasin evitable.'

'I don't think you are safe,' said Tim. 'Would you like me to come up and sleep at the Priory to be a second hand?'

'Thank you for the offer, but I think it is not necessary,' replied the tutor. He had a repugnance to the man. 'It would only alarm the ladies.'

Tim O'Baien looked rather admiringly at the tutor.

'By the powers, Surridge,' he said with his strong Irish accent, 'you have pluck enough for a man twice your size! It is a bold thing to live with only an old man and a boy in the danger you are all in.'

The tutor only smiled:

'I wish the women were safe,' added Tim. 'If Coghlan chooses to be shot, why, let him; but I am awful anxious for the ladies.'

'And indeed so am I,' replied James; 'and I trust he will take them away on his return.'

'Urge it upon him,' exclaimed Tim with energy. 'Let them leave even before his return if possible.

The tutor readily promised that he would advise it, and added—

'I heard at the lodge just now that your father has actually paid the sum formerly demanded by the Whiteboys. Is it true?'

Tim flushed a little.

'Well, yes, it is,' he replied reluctantly. 'You see there had been another warning or two contradicting Captain Rock's denial; my mother got frightened, and made him do it. But we shall be obliged to go to Dublin after all, I think.'

'It was a mistake to pay,' said the tutor. 'Mr. Coghlan would not have allowed Mr. O'Brien to do so if he had been at home. But here is the lodge; I must wish you good-by, and thank you for your offer.'

They parted, and O'Brien went on alone. He had reached the narrowest and darkest part of the road leading towards his home, when a tall powerful man sprang suddenly from the hedge and stood before him.

'Captain,' exclaimed Tim in a low voice 'who would have thought of seeing you here?'

'Not you, I believe,' was the reply; 'for you would not have been at your dirty tricks again, Misther O'Brien. So you have got a hundred pounds from your father, have you, for the good of the cause? You lying gossoon?'

Tim stood confused and silent.

'Now look here,' continued Captain Rock, 'we are up for a grand cause, and for vengeance; but we ain't thieves. Thieves! Some a one of us, except yourself; and you'll manage to return that money in my name, or—And he put his hand to his breast, where he had a pistol.

'But Captain,' remonstrated Tim, 'it's only my own father I've taxed. It's more froic, man—just a bit of fun for a laugh.'

'Arrah, It's no laughing matter!' exclaimed the Whiteboy. 'Your jest will prove of the grimmest. Send back the money at once, or Mister O'Brien may chance to see his dear son hanging from the oak before his dining room window, with the word 'thief' pinned on his breast.

Tim was throughly frightened; with all his brag, he was at heart a coward.

'I will give back all I can;' he said doggedly; 'but I have spent twenty pounds of it.'

'It's a sieve for money to run through you are,' replied the other scornfully. 'But tell me, have you done the job you undertook? Your fall hindered it so long, as it is.'

'I have,' muttered Tim 'and It's accursed I am for the deed. But you'll remember your promise?'

'To spare the colleen? Ay, that will be for her own sake! But this money You will put the whole on your father's brekfast table with this paper tomorrow morning, or meet your due.'

'Impossible!,' exclaimed Tim. 'I shall have to get the twenty pounds somewhere—'

'I'll lend it to you,' said the outlaw; 'and you'll pay me, I know, in time, for you value your life above that sum or any other. Here it is'—opening a leather bag he drew from his pocket and countang out the guineas; 'and let it be your last act of that nature, Misther Tim, in your name. And now for your report sir.'

The two men then walked slowely on, in low and ernest conversation. Tim was entirely subjected to the will of the tall rough-looking man, who was the Whiteboys' Chief. He loved Glorvina in his fashion; and he meant, in the event of danger from his confederates, with whom he was of course personally secure, to appear as her chivalrous rescuer. Mr. Coghlan's death would relieve him from all debts owing to him; for Tim knew wel where the I O U's he had given were kept, and he would assuredly be able to secure them at the time of confusion.

At length as the road opened and houses appeared, the pair stopping for an instant.

'You will not forget?' said the Whiteboy threateningly.

'I will not. And—and you have not heard about O'Rourke?'

'I have, and the other martyrs to our cause. We will have life for life, for him and for them.' And with the[illegible] [illegible] away.

CHAPTER IX.

'If you please, sorr,' said Murphy the next day to the tutor, as he was starting with Teddy for his morning walk, 'is it by the farm you'll be going this morning?'

'We can go that way if you like, Murphy,' was the reply.

'Then if you just would, sorr, and order Nancy Bryant to send us down a pair of fowls for to-morrow's dinner I'd be obliged.'

'We will do so, Murphy;' and they started on their walk, in which the ladies did not that day join them.

It was a fine morning, fresh and bright, with just a touch of frost in the air. The meadow through which they passed was no longer dangerous on account of the bull, which had been secured; and Teddy ran on fearlessly in front of his tutor. On the way they met Captain Leicester walking briskly towards the Priory.

'This is much the shorter road from the barracks,' he said, after they had exchanged greetings, 'and I have always taken it as it is a straight path as a crow flies, only there are sundry gates to leap.'

'And in dirty weather plenty of mud by the pig-sties,' put in Teddy.

Leicester laughed, nodded, and went on.

They saw no one about as they approached the farm; but, as they drew near the door, they heard Nancy Bryant's voice raised to a high pitch.

'It's a sin and a shame,' she said; 'and it's not true Irish they are that will side with the vile Sassenach, that ought to be driven every one on 'em into the sea. It's revenge the boys will give you, Sarah mavourneen, for the wrong they've done ye.'

The tutor advanced to the door and called Mrs. Bryant. In a moment the woman appeared, looking very sullen. The tutor delivered his message, and then said—

'Who is the poor woman within whose sobs I hear?'

'It's Sarah O'Rourke,' was the reply 'Dan O'Rourke's sister, sorr. It's the ill news she has this day.'

'I am sorry for her,' said the tutor gently—'poor soul!'

'She is a poor soul indeed!' muttered the woman. 'Her brother's murered, or as good, and she with those eight fatherless babes to feed!'

The tutor put his hand in his pocket; then paused.

'I should like to speak to her,, he said.

The woman who had noticed the action, made way for him to enter the kitchen' where Sarah O'Rourke sat rocking herself in a chair, Kathleen, with red eyes standing by.

'My poor girl,' said James approaching her, and patting his hand kindly on her shoulder, 'I am truely sorry for you.'

There was such tender symythy in his tone, that the girl raised her bowed head and looked at him with her tear-swollen eyes.

'They are going to hang him, sur—to hang my brother!' she cried with a wail.

'It is a bad trial to you, Sarrah. Will it comfort you to know that your poor brother has had the best possible defence?'

'No? Has he, sir?'—eagerly. 'I have only heard what folks tell me. Bridget can't write, poor soul—nor he neither, and she'd be in too sore trouble to do so, if she could.'

'Well, Mr. Coghlan, who very [illegible] willingly confessed what he had seen Dan do, engaged the best counsel to be had for him, and hoped that the clever lawyer might undo the harm he couldn't help doing him.'

'And did he that, surely?' cried the girl. 'An' a power of money that cost, don't it, sir?'

'A great deal, but Miss Desmond will pay anything for him and you, though it is right I should tell you that Dan has done wickedly.'

She hung her head.

'I know,' she allowed, 'he killed poor Barney O'More. I was heart broken to hear his wife cry for him. But we forget all they had done when our dear one's are in trouble,' she said pathetically.

'We do indeed! And, Sarah, I am sure if any effort can save your brother, it will be made by Mr. Coghlan. His wife heard from him to day, and he says he is staying in town over the trial to try what he can do to save him—to get him respited.'

'The Virgin bless him!' sobbed Sarah.

'And, if he does not succeed, it will not be his fault, remember,' added the tutor.

Then he took a guinea from his pocket.

'You must use this to feed the children, Sarah,' he said, giving it to her. 'And I will speak to Miss Desmond about them. She will be sure to take care that they would not want.

Sarah was eloquent in thanks for the clergyman's kindness. He saw that she was greatly consoled by the fact that a 'great lawyer' had been employed for her brother's defence. Moreover a hope of pardon had dawn on her.

The clergyman glad to have let the people know that Mr. Coghlan had done his best for them, then left the farm with Teddy, who was looking very grave and puzzled.

'An' there goes a heretic that ought to be saved, if it's by a miracle!' exclaimed old Nancy, a devout Roman Catholic. 'And saved he will be by conversion by-and-by, you may depend!'

'It's he that saved my life from the bull,' said Kathleen.

'Then it's lucky he is; and may his words come true!' ejaculated Sarah as she rose to return to her little charges.

Surridge hastened on his return to inform Glorvina of his interview with O'Rourke's sister. He found her engaged chatting to Captain Leicester, with Eva and Mrs. Coghland; but, at a hint that he wished to speak to her, she came out and led the way to the study. She listened to his accoant with eyes brimful of tears.

'The poor soul!' I am sorry for them! But you gave Sarah just the comfort she needed, Mr. Surridge. How good you are! We must send the aid again, but your generous help will suffice for thepresent.

That evening Glorvina was more than gracious to the tutor. She made him draw into their family circle and by dint of good-humoured teasing found out that he could sing, and at once pressed him into her service for duets, Captain Leicester being evidently to engrossed by Eva to lend the aid of his baritone voice; and James, as it proved, sang admirably. He had a fine voice, and, as he interpreted some of the tender old ballads of the country, Glorvina was fascinated by his expression and pathos.

'Now we have found out that we have caged a singing bird, we shall not let it be silent,' she said playfully. 'Why, Mr Surridge, we don't know what we may develop in you next!'

She met his eyes as she spoke, and a sudden blush burned on her cheek. She put aside her work and went to the fire, where the others were sitting.

That night, when the girls went up to bed, Eva put her arms around Glorvina and led her into her bedroom.

'I want to speak to you, Glory—to warn you!'

'About what?'—with rather a consious plush.

'Oh, I think you guess! That poor little tutor!,

'Mr. Surridge! Why do you call him little? He is as tall as your father.'

TO PUBLIC SPEAKERS.

Public speakers and singers who would possess a clear voice, freedom from hoarseness and sore throat should use Hagyard's Pectoral balsam, a safe, pleasant and certain healer for the throat and lungs; it speedily breaks up a cold and cures all pulmonary complaints, that so often lead to incurable Consumption.

One of the ground? on which an Ohio wife demands a divorce is that her husband habitually sleeps with a pistol in his hand.

The following is from an advertisement published at Bristol, Conn.: "Lost, strayed, or stolen from his bereaved household, one red-headed man five feet and eight inches tall, full set of false teeth on upper jaw, and one realone on lower jaw. Please cause said man to be arrested and returned to his bereaved wife."

ANGRY wife (time, 2 A M.)—"Is that you, Charles?" Jolly husband—"Zash me." Angry wife—"Here have I been standing at the head of the stairs these two hours. Oh, Charles, how can you?" Jolly husband (bracing up)—"Shtandin' on your head on t'shtairs? Jenny, I'm shprised! How can I? By Jove can't! Two hours too? 'Strornary woman!"

A CINCINNATI young woman killed her baby by stabbing it thirteen times with a knife. The only witness of the crime was her lover. Ohio law does not compel a husband to testify against his wife in a criminal trial, and therefore the marriage of the couple was considered a sure way of saving the prisoner. The authorities undertook to prevent the union, but were sufficiently vigilant for a marriage ceremony was surreptitiously, [illegible] legally, performed in jail.

HE WASN'T DECEIVED.

A prominent Detroiter was yesterday toiling up Woodward avenue with his hat on the back of his head and his handkerchief in his hand, when he was halted by a stranger who seemed to have shared the quarters of the ground-hog for the last month of winter.

"You live in the city, I take it?" queried the stranger.

"Yes, sir."

"Are you posted on the weather?"

"I presume so."

"Do you think we'll have any more sleighing this spring?"

"No, of course not."

"Any show for any more blizzards?"

"I don't think so."

"Is it your candid opinion that spring is here?"

"Why, yes."

"May have one more snow storm, eh?"

"I don't think so. Everything indicates that spring is at hand. But why are you so interested in the weather?"

"Well, the case with me is just this: My partner and I travel through the country and mend tinware and sell peppermint essence during the summer. He's been down in the poorhouse for the last month, and I've been scraping along on an income of twenty-seven cents per day. If you are a citizen of standing, and you seem to be, and if you know anything about the weather, and you appear to, I'll drop a postal card to my pard to come up and join me and we'll head for the country. Do you guarrantee that it won't snow like blazes in less than twenty-four hours?"

"No, sir! No, sir! No, sir!" shouted the indignant citizen, as he started on.

"You won't, eh?"

"No, sir! No, sir!"

"Then, sir, it is plain that you meant to deceive me! But you can't do it—no, sir. I'll at once invest in two more snow-shovels and another pair of mittens, and before night I'll have contracts to take care of about 600 feet of the next blizzard! Let 'er come, sir—let 'er whoop right along!"

DOES WEALTH BRING HAPPINESS?

On one of the last days of his earthly existence Mr. John Hopkins, of Baltimore, called his devoted gardener to him and said: "I am beginning to hate this place, because it does not bring in money. Did you ever feed hogs? Have you not observed that the strong animals bear away the ears of corn and that the weaker ones pursue them squealingly, in hopes that some or all of the treasure, will be lost or dropped?" The gardener replied that the sketch was a true one. "Well, then," said Mr. Hopkins, "I am that strong hog. I have that big ear of corn, and every piggish rascal in Baltimore is intent upon stealing it or wresting it from me? Sir," he said, turning brusquely to the gardener, "do you think a very rich man is happy?" The gardener answered, "The extreme of poverty is a sad thing. The extreme of wealth, no doubt bears with it many tribulations." Mr. Hopkins rejoined: "You are right, my friend; next to the hell of being utterly bereft of money is the purgatory of possessing a vast amount of it. I have a mission, and under its shadow I have accumulated wealth, but not happiness."

IT WAS ALL RIGHT.

Several people were making purchases in a Woodward Avenue grocery yesterday, when an old man with a cane in one hand and bundle in the other stood in the door and asked:—

"Did any of you drive up here in a sleigh?"

"Yes, I did," replied one.

"Was it an old white hoss?"

"Yes."

"And an old woman in the cutter?"

"Yes."

"And can she mannage that hoss?"

"I guess she can."

"Then it's all right," said the man of the cane and bundle. "The old hoss has run away, and the old woman was hanging to the dashboard and yelling murder with all her might, but if she can manage him there's no use in any body getting excited. Let me inquire what the price of cranberries is to-day."—Detroit Free Press.

"Gracious me!" said an old lady in a witness box, "what curious critters you lawyers are! Do you s'pose I can tell you everything about nothing I don't know nothin' about?"

[illegible] even [illegible] of development know as training. At a recent rowing match at Philadelphia, two plucky lads in one of the boats fainted as soon as the race was over. There condition, which was apparently good, was actually abnormal, and their systems gave way because the strain which their muscles met was too great for their vital functions. Recently a similar but more serious calamity occurred at Sag Harbor. A Brooklyn lad who had taken part in a pedestrian contest, when removed from the track, fell down dead. He had prepared himself for walking and running, and depleted his vital organs to build up his limbs. When the strain came the impoverished and most important part gave way. The severe muscular exercise of college athletes has carried off many fine young men with consumption, heart disease, and other disorders, directly traceable to the absurd overwork required of their bodies. There is a limit to human endurance. That limit is reached when the body is impaired in one quarter to benefit special organs. The severity of the test by which athlete prizes are won seems designed rather to award the laurels to him who is the least healthy, because more unevenly developed, than to the really best man.—*Boston Jour. TOBACCO SMOKE.

In further research on this subject Dd. LeBon finds that colodine, the new alkaloid existing in tobacco smoke (with other aromatic principles, and prussic acid, as well as nicotine) is a liquid of agreeable and very penetrating odor, and as poisonous as nicotine, the twentieth part of one drop sufficing to paralyze and kill a frog. It is the prussic acid and various aromatic principles that cause headache, giudiness and nausea in smoking certain tobaccos that contain little nicotine. Other tobaccos, rich in nicotine, have no such effects. The tobaccos containing most prussic acid and collodine are those of Havana and the Levant. The dark semi-liquid matter which condenses in pipes and cigar-holders contains all the substances just named, as well as carbonate of amonia, tarry and coloring matter, &c. It is very poisonous, two or three drops of it will kill a small animal. The combustion of tobacco destroys but a small portion of the nicotine, and most of these appear in the smoke. The proportions absorbed by smokers varies according to circumstances, but hardly evtr falls below 50 centigramm[illegible] per 100 grammes of tobacco burnt. About the same amount of ammonia is absorbed at the same time. Naturally more of the poisonous principles are absorbed where the smoke is breathed (as in a room); less in the open air. A frog placed in an open receiver containing a solution of nicotine, with about one drop of that substance to a little water, secumbs in a few hours. Tobacco smoke contains about 8 milliters of carbonic oxide per 100 grammes of tobacco burnt. The poisous properties of to-bacco are not due to this gas, as has been maintained in Germany.—Sdientific American.

T., G. & B. R. R.

It appears that the arrangement to lease the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway to the Grand Trunk Company is to be opposed, and that hopes of having through traffic to the seaboard by way of either New York or Montreal are not to be realized, if the efforts of Mr. Wm. Hendrie prove successful.

It appears that Mr. Hendrie, although a bondholder and Director of the T., G. & B. R'y., is also more largely interested in the Hamilton and North-Western Railway, which is now amalgated with the Northern, and hence his desire to thwart the Grand Trunk arrangement.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors held on Friday last, Mr. Hendrie moved, that the offer of the Hamilton and North-Wester and Northern be accepted, when it was moved in amendmedt by Mr. J. J. Middleton, seconded by Mr. Thos. Gibson, and resolved, that as the proposal now made in writing by the Hamilton and North-Western and Northern Companies, is the same as that made verbally by the committee from those Companies, and declined by this Company, the papers now submitted by them be laid on the table, and no fur action taken thereon. The amendment was carried, and now Mr. Hendrie is going to bring the matter before the bondholders and shareholders.

Fortunately for the people of this County no agreement can be ratified without the consent of the Lieutenant Govenor in Council. This Mr. Hendrie thinks he can obtain, and no doubt he will put forth every effort to do so; it therefore behoves our people to attend the monster deputation now being got up to interview the Lieutenant Governor in opposition to Mr. Hendrie's views.

Some of our readers may ask,—"What difference does it make what Company runs the road, as long as the gauge is widened and it is well managed?" The difference is this—If the Grand Trunk lease the road, grain and other produce could be shipped through to any desired point without breaking bulk. This would induce buyers from a distance to come among us, causing better prices to be paid from the fact of the greater competition; but should the Norther get controll of the road our hopes in this respect will be futile. And further, we have been informed upon excellent authority, that Mr. Cumberland used his best endeavors to induce Mr. Wragge to raise the freight on grain. What will follow should he get control of the road our readers can imagine.

Another object these gentlemen have in view is to prevent any of the traffic from the great North-West from passing over this route, a great portion of which would if the G. T. take our road, to the great injury of the Northern, hence the strenuous opposition now being offered to the closing of the bargain with the Grand Trunk.

It is all very well for Mr. Hendrie to talk about the interests of Toronto being jeopardized by the Grand Trunk arrangement. The interest of the municipalities and Toronto, are widely differen. We must have the original bargain carried out. To let the Nortnern have it would place us in a worse condition than we are at present? therefore we hope the Deputation for Thursday, 12th inst will be largely attended. The fare both ways is only $1. Messrs Wragge and Beatty wished to take those composing the deputation free but; as the board was not a unit on the matter they were unable to do so. Don't forget the 12th inst. Our present and future welfare depends on opposing Mr. Hendrie's scheme, and that can only be done by large and influential deputation.

THE SCOTT ACT IN LAMBTON.

The Scott Act came into force in the County of Lambton on Monday last, and the state of affairs, as regards the travelling public, are rather unpleasant. The hotel keepers have closed their houses and fenced in their sheds, and sternly refuse admitance to any and all—friend or foe alike.—The farmers have to leave their teams on the streets, and stage drivers who have patronized the same hotel for the last seven years, were refused even a feed of oats for their horses. Commercial travellers who arrived by the trains at Sairnia and other places found no porters awaiting their coming, and were seen wending their way up street dragging their ponderous trunks after them, but, alas! only to find the hotel doors bared against them, and nothing stronger than ginger pop or John Bull Bitters with which to revive their drooping spirits obtainable. The hotel keepers say the will adhere to this plan as long as the act remains in force. As the Act cannot be repealed for three years, the probability of their holding out is rather doubtful. In the meantime arrangements are being made by the temperance people, as rapidly as possible, for the accommodation of the public.

MRS. T. G. MORGAN, Hairdresser, will be in Priceville on Thursday, 12th inst., at Tuck's Hotel, from 10 a.m. to 1 p.m., and at Flesherton Hotel from 2 to 4 p.m.

Correspondence to the STANDARD.

Mr. William Elder is resolved that every bill shall be made low. He has removed a mountain of clay opposite his residence, and is building a stone fence that will be an ornament to our Village. Thomas Davis, Esq., architect, from the Valley, is overseeing the work.

While the men were levelling the hill above referred too, they came across a bread cake at the depth of four feet from the serface, quite fresh and good. it was supposed to have been deposited there about 12 years since. One of the men tasted it, and declared it quite eatable.

On Monday, May 2, while putting cornice on Joseph Smith's house, William Sloan received a severe fall from the breaking of the scaffold. Besides being badly shaken, he received a couple of severe wounds on the forehead. I am happy to say, however, that he is getting along nicely.

Mrs. W. Bradley has had a very severe attack of inflammation of the lungs, and on Sabbath was very low, so much so, that a second doctor was called in; but by the skilful care of Dr. Christoe, who was with her from the first, she has rallied, and hopes are now entertained of her recovery.

We had a fashionable wedding call at our Village last week, and after a halt for refreshments, they bade us adiew, and went South. They had not gone far ere a desire seized them to see who had the fastest nag. Result—nine buggies more or less damaged.

AT LAST.— Durham has got a train into the town at last. A cargo of salt has been hauled in by an engine and their is great rejoicing thereat. We congratulate our neighbours on this seasonable arrival so that they need not be afraid of their lamb and mutton going to waste. If the next train brings some sugar and lemons they will be able to indulge in ice cream to their hearts content. No doubt they can get a supply of ice at home, without importing it by Railway.—Post.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

SIR,—A few days ago my attention was drawn to a communication in your valuable paper, signed E. E. Knott, whose property has been insured in the Dominion Grange Mutual Fire Insurance Association for four years past. I at once came to the conclusion that Mr. E. E. Knott would reinsure his property in the Sydenham Mutual Fire Insurance Company, as he would have a perfect right to do if he so desired. This article was dated 31st March last. I trust you will allow me space to briefly refer to this communication. Judge of my surprise a few days after, at receiving an application from Mr. E. E. Knott and his respected father for four years in the Company I represent, for over $4,000—it therefore does seem with all its faults Mr. E. E. Knott loves this Company still, but dislikes its manager. The object of Mr. Knott's letter appears to be two-fold, 1st to secure, if possible, a newspaper war between the Sydenham Mutual Fire Insurance Company and myself; 2nd to vent a little of his spleen against me personally. He will not succeed in creating a war between the directors and officers of the Sydenham Company and myself, as for the last four years the Companies mentioned, their directors and officers, have worked together very harmoniously, and I can assure Mr. Knott that I have the most kindly feelings for the officers and directors of the Sydenham M. F. Insurance Company. As to the 2nd apparent object of your correspondent, I beg to say, if it affords him any gratification to misstate figures, and misrepresent the Dominion Grange Insurance Company to make a little cheap capital for his Stock Company, he is welcome to all the pleasure and profit he can secure. It is quite true Mr. Knott was at one time an agent of the Company I represent, for East Grey. He informed me he could not attend to the work outside his own Townships, he employed a young man of whom our Board knew nothing, and who was quite incompetent, and set him to work as a sub-agent. This was not satisfactory to our Board of Directors. Mr. Daniel Wright, of Collingwood Township, was appointed to the agency. That gentleman is old enough to be willing to receive instruction in his business, and act accordingly, the result being that he stands at the head of our list of agents for quantity and accuracy of work. Mr. Knott also informed me that he would like the appointment of Inspector to our Company. The subject was laid before the Board who wisely concluded that losses should be adjusted by the Director living nearest the locality of loss. I learned that because I carried out the wishes of my Directors Mr. Knott had no friendly feeling towards me personally. I will say here that Mr. Knott's figures given are nothing but imaginary figures, and not the true figures as given in our Report, a copy of which Mr. Knott has in his possession. and it is time enough when that gentleman gives correct figures, to answer his communication. Your correspondent states as follows: "The Grange Insurance Co. pays its Manager, Treasurer, and Secretary $2,-113.75." This is untrue and a fabrication. In the Report referred to, under the head of Expenditure, any member by examining the Report, will find the following: "Salaries, including policy writing, $1,250.50," which is the amount paid for salaries of above officers including accountant's salary, which is $500 itself, and he is worth every cent of it. Again Mr. E. E. Knott informs the readers of THE STANDARD in comparing the Grange Company with the Sydenham Company, as follows, (the language is Mr. Knott's, not mine,) "It has only about one-third more all told policies in force to-day, and these policies do not cover over one-third more risks, &c." At the close of 1880 the Sydenham Company had as follows:

Policies in force, 903.

Amount at risk	$1,043,122.00
Premium Notes	19,808.24
At the same date the Grange Company had as follows:
Policies in Force 34.39.
Amount at Risk	4,181,552.00
Premium Notes and cash net after all deductions	105,256.30

Policies in force not one-third more, but nearly four times as many. Amount at risk was not one-third more but over four times much. Capital, not one-third more, but over five times as great. The Sydenham Company makes a good showing for a local Company The Grange Company being not a local but a Provincial Company, ought to be larger. So much for Mr. E. E. Knott's accuracy. Where figures in other respects are so wide of the mark, I will not attempt to follow him. Mr. Knott again says: Now, the fact is, by comparison shown above, and by further comparing the aggregate expenditure of the Companies less the amount paid for fire-claims, viz: The Grange Insurance Co., $4,775.05, and the Sydenham Co., $290.08, just about 17 times less." What! Elisha! $4,775.05 besides fire claims! Are you sane? This is too big to be swallowed by any one. The question arises, 1st, can Mr. Knott read? If so, then why such incorrect figures? I must seriously say that I cannot, considering Mr. Knott's position, for one moment believe it possible for him to be so ignorant of plain statements of figures, as is shown in his communication. Can it be possible that he is so lost to all self-respect as to deliberately coin the figures for malicious purposes, when over three hundred farmers in East Grey have the Reports to refer to, I cannot think so ill of friend Knott. These inaccuracies must arise from either one cause or the other, and your readers must judge for themselves. As to Postage, I would say that we send reports to our members at one cent each. Reports to members, Sub.-Grange and Division Grange Secretaries in 1880, cost about	$33 00

Notices of notes maturing, and sending out notes when paid, cost on about 600, 3 cents each, or 6 cents on notices and Notes when paid,	36 00
Monthly circulars to agents and directors about	8 00
We have thus on three items alone	$77 00

Mr. Knott's cheap [illegible] 000 letters and his insulting remarks connected therewith I will not notice further than to say he can see a detailed daily postage account at our office which can be proved correct on oath, and the Directors have very carefully examined and certified this expenditure. Mr. Knott was careful not to compare the losses of the two companies, Sydenham $1573.78 with the Grange Company $2181.62, because it did not suit his purpose taking the proportion of each Company's risks held our losses to be equal to that of the Sydenham would be three times greater than they were, or about $6,000. We actually had a favorable year, our losses being below an average, and those of the Sydenham Co. being above an average, and such a comparison for a single year would show our company to advantage, but would be unfair to the Sydenham Co. as we would be putting our best year against their worst year, and Directors cannot be held accountable for occasional heavy losses. At the same time I do hold that a few hundred dollars spent in paying Directors and other experienced officers in carefully examining in minute detail every application for insurance; being careful to allow no one to over-insure, is well spent, and sometimes saves thousands dollars in losses. I regret, Mr. Editor, to have trespassed on your space, and trust friend Knott will not compel me to again ask space for gratuitous advertising, for his or any other Company, but if he is really spoiling for a fight let him bring out his own Stock Company, which he must consider inferior to ours or he would insure in it.

Yours truly,
R. J. DOYLE.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

SIR,—The public should know, especially the members of the Glenelg Agricultural Society, that there are gentlemen occupying the responsible position of Directors of said society, who seem disposed at the present juncture to sacrifice the interests of said society to private friendship. It is a most singular thing that gentlemen, who in private personal matters are known to be exacting to the last cent, will so readily, and apparently with profound indifference allow tens of dollars of public money to be wrongfully withheld from the society because it has by some hocus-pocus art found its way into a friend's pocket. There is no denying the fact that this sort of conduct on the part of any body of intelligent men, betokens a conspicuous lack of moral stamina coupled with a very limping sort of honesty, which cannot fail to discount them seriously in the estimation of all right thinking men. If the late defaulting Secretary-Treasurer justly owes the Society $150, why in all conscience, we ask, should the Directors accept of a less sum, and that too without interest? To do so would simply be offering a premium to dishonesty, a course which surely no right-minded, honourable man would care to follow.

A DIRECTOR.
MARKDALE, April 25, 1881

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

DEAR SIR,—At the Quarterly business meeting of the Methodist Church Markdale, held on the 2nd inst, there was an intimation from Holland Centre Mission, to the effect that steps would be taken by Chatsworth Circuit at the coming District meeting (which will be held in Owen Sound on the 17th inst.,) to do away with the above mission, by reuniting it with Chatsworth, all except that part known as Walker's appointment, which would be reunited with this circuit.

There are as many appointments now on this circuit as can well be attended by one minister. However, we think the Markdale portion of this circuit is prepared to make the following offer on condition that the people of Walker's appointment, and those of Pleasant Valley will amalgamate and build a Brick Church at 70 side-road on the gravel, viz:—$300, a sum which we think would pay for half the cost of a brick building large enough to accommodate the two congregations combined.

An adjourned meeting of the board will be held in the vestry on the 16th inst., at 2 p.m., when there will be a good opportunity for those interested to consider the matter.

A MEMBER OF THE BOARD.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

SIR,—The members of the Glenelg Agricultural Society and others interested will be pleased to hear that the Directors have succeeded in obtaining from the late defaulting Treasurer a portion of the money due said Society. On Saturday night last Mr. Lyons paid over the sum of $122 25, which will at once be available for the use of the Society—the balance, amounting to about $50, will probably be forthcoming before the fall exhibition. The Directors deserve the thanks of the society for their energy and perseverance in bringing this unpleasant business to a successful issue. Had the defalcacation not been discovered there is no telling where the matter would have ended, or how long the society would continue to exist under the annual fleecing to which it was subjected. This case furnishes a striking illustration of the ease and readiness with which a Smart Treasurer may appropriate the funds of a voluntary society, composed as Township Agricultural Societies generally are, of honest, simple, unsuspecting farmers.

In a voluntary association the idea of self and individuality is so lost in that of generality that the same close scrutiny and attention is not given to its affairs that would be bestowed where personal interest is involved, so that notwithstanding all the checks and safeguards which Government and Municipal Councils may devise in the shape of Annual Returns and Yearly Audits, &c. The Smart man can, like the illustrious O'Connell, "drive a coach and four through them all and carry off the Lion's share of the spoils."

GENNA.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

DEAR SIR,—To every thoughtful, well-disposed, and patriotic citizen of our fair village the occurrence of the last few days cannot fail to impress the mind with the gravest apprehensions. That there are baleful influences at work in our midst cannot be denied. The death-roll amongst our little ones but too plainly attests th[e] fact. It is deplorable that notwithstanding all that has been said and written in reference to the sanitary condition of our village. Notwithstanding all that has been suffered by our people from the dire effects of the plague-breeding "pest" house which one of our butchers has been allowed to maintain in the very midst of the most densely populated portion of the village, the work of destruction still goes on.

Nothing it seems will move our Police Trustees to a sense of the duty which they owe to the public. The spirit of mammon we fear so dominates our business men that they are afraid to speak out their minds in reference to this or any other question of public utility lest they offend a customer that apparently nothing short of a general plague involving every household will arouse them from their stupid—nay brutal—indifference.

Will not the tears of bereaved mothers move them? Will not the ghosts of the departed innocents whose blood is crying to heaven for vengeance affright them? We fear not, nothing but a dip down deep into their pockets will avail—that alone can influence some natures.

Who will apply the sovereign balm? Who will take the initiative in an honest endeavor to "rescuing the perishing?"

COUNTY ITEMS.

SUDDEN DEATH.— A lad named Micks, about 15 or 16 years of age, son of Mrs. Micks, of Egremont, who was in the employ of Mr. Wm. Greenwood, 6th con., Glenelg, died veery suddenly on Saturday last. He was, it appears, out on that day driving a team harrowing, and although complaining of a sore throat nothing serious was apprehended, and he continued at work until Mr. Greenwood noticed that he appeared sick and told him to sit down and that he (Mr. Greenwood) would finish the harrowing himself when he got through sowing, and the lad did as requested, but when Mr. G. returned after crossing the field, which only occupied a few minutes, he found the poor boy quite dead.—Chronicle.

FIRE.—On Friday afternoon last between one and two o'clock, the frame barn, stables and sheds, the property of Mr. Alex. McComb, lot 18 con. 1st, S. D. R., Glenelg, were completely destroyed by fire together with contents, consisting of a quantity of wheat, oats, peas, barley, five tons of hay and farm implements. The only property rescued from the burning buildings was a fanning mill and a bag of wheat and in getting out the latter Mr. McComb had one of his hands and his head very badly burned. The origin of the fire is not known but is supposed to have been caused by a spark from burning brush on an adjoining farm; the wind being high at the time. The buildings and contents were insured in the London Mutual for $700. Loss about $1500. —Chronicle.

FIRE.—A destructive fire occurred on the premises of Mr. McMaster on Saturday last, which resulted in utterly destroying his barn and its contents, it is reported the fire originated from matches which his children were carelessly handling.—Union Standard.

On Friday last a horse belonging to Mr. J. Sparling, Euphrasia in going to water was caught by a buckle on the harness in some way, and commencing to kick tore a gash about a yard and a quarter long on the inside of the thigh and along the abdomen. G. B. Holmes, V S. put thirty-seven stitches in it.—Monitor.

ON Friday evening last, Miss Robertson, who with her patrents left town on Wednesday to reside in the city for a short time previous to going to the old country, was presented by the teachers of the Presbyterian Sabbath School with a very handsome Bible Dictionary. On the Tuesday evening previous Miss Robertson entertained her Sabbath Sshool class at tea, and they presented her with a magnificent pair of vases.—Monitor.

DIPHTHERIA.

A RADICAL CURE FOR THE INSIDIOUS DISEASE.

DR. H. P. GAUTHIER, of St. Paul, has an article in the last number of the Chicago Medical Review, which by reason of the prevalence of diphtheria in this section, is of peculiar interest just now. The article is as follows:—

While a Natchez, Miss., in the early part of 1865, I was led through my experience to adopt the treatment I now propose to describe. For some years subsequent to my return to Illinois, I treated all the cases I encountered (fifty in number) with complete success, by the same means, and I have since treated 150 cases, with the same satisfactory result, except in two cases, where death occurred, the patients being almost moribund when coming under treatment. Previous to the adoption of the present mode of treatment, my results were by no means as satisfactory, the disease proving fatal in at least one-third of the whole number of cases. The treatment which has proven so successful in my hands, is as follows: The patient is ordered tincture of iodine in ten or twelve drop doses every hour, well diluted with water, so long as the fever lasts, subsequently reducing it to ten drops every three hours: local applications of the drug are made use of at the same time. These latter should be made by the physician himself at least twice a day. For internal use I gave latterly the decolorized tincture; bread and starchy articles of diet are used in abundance. Such is my treatment. Having given it in detail, I shall now cite afew cases, dealing at first with the unsuccessful ones.

CASE I.—Six years ago I was called to a patient on Robert Street—a boy six years of age—who was cyanotic, and whose throat displayed the usual diphtheritic patches, some of them proceeding to gangrene. The case was seen in consultation with Dr S of St. Paul, but despite all efforts, soon he died.

CASE II TO III.—In the course of the next week, I was again called by the mother of the last patient to see two children ill from the same disease, but only in the early stages. The iodine treatment was freely and fully used, and despite a very severe illness, the patients recovered perfectly.

CASE IV.—Five years ago I was called to see a child lying in a neat frame house, built upon dry sand. The child's family, together with another French family of [illegible] members, occupied the house. On my arrival, I found the child nearly moribund from diptheria, and he soon died. Six children in the same house were attacked with the disease, but being promptly treated in the way indicated, recovered.

The two cases already cited are the only ones in which death has occured since my adoption of the above treatment.

CASE V.—Fifteen days ago a worn-out cripple came up to see me from the timber region, much run down physically, and with his throat in a dangerous condition. The prompt free use of [illegible] enabled him to engage in his usual avocation in the course of six days.

These, and numerous other cases show that the remedy is of decided value sufficent to warrent its trial in every case of diphtheria, to the exclusion of other consitutional remidies.

IN A QUANDARY.

One of the census enumerators, whose district is in St. John's Ward, Toronto, a few days ago called at a pleasant-looking little cottage, and made known his errand. He was kindly received by the lady of the house, who signified her willingness to answer all the questions propounded.

"What is the age of your husband?" asked the polite man with the big book.

"Thirty-six years," was the reply.

"And your own," enquired the privileged person.

"I am thirty-two," she blushingly made answer.

"What does your family number" was the question,

"I have nine children, said the comely housewife, as she gathered the bevy of little ones around her.

The enumerator fancied that a mistake had been made in the number, and endeavored to count them himself, but failed owing to the restlessness of the youngest.

"Would you please give their ages, madam?"

"Yes, Mary is aged ten; then there's David and William, they are eight."

"Now ain't that peculiar," erupted the enumerator, "both of the same age?"

"Not at all," replied the mother, rivetting her eyes on the carpet. "They are twins."

"Oh! I see. Please continue."

"Robert, he is six past; and Maggie and John has just turned five."

"Ah, same ages. No mistake, madam?" said the questioner enquiringly, as he lifted his eyes from the tabulated sheet in front of him.

"No sir, they are twins," exclaimed the lady. The enumerator felt hot, and showed his colour on his cheeks.

"Then their's Maddie and Maud.', continued the mother, "they are aged three years and two months."

A silence followed, and the statisical hunter clutched his pencil, looking puzzled, but determined to stifle any remark that might rise to his lips. The mother appeared to be waiting for the usual request for explanation and the silence was finally broken by the enumerating man asking, in a choked voice, "Twins I suppose, madam?"

An answer was given in the affirmative, and the age colum was completed when little Hessie was entered as the one-year-old baby.

The enumerator's kindly old face wore a puzzled expreion as he left the house, and his mind is constantly reverting to the cosy little home where he entered the family of twins.—Mail.

He groaned in his sleep, and his wife arose to light the lamp. He beheld a display of striped stockings, and then murmured to himself: "I've got 'em sure this time" "Got what?" she inquired. "Got the delirium tremens. I'm seeing animals of all kinds. I've just seen a zebra." She turned down the light, and the menagere closed.

A CARD OF THANKS.

Brooklin, March 30th, 1881.

To Mr. S. BEAL, Agent Dominion Grange Mutual Insurance Association

SIR,—I have to thank you for your care in the general selection of risks in your Company, and the directors, for careful management, by which has been secured such an excellent financial standing in four years.

I was one of the first insured in the Company, to the amount of $800, I paid $6, and gave an undertaking besides. My undertaking has been returned to me unassessed, and eighty cents in cash paid back, I have thus secured the most reliable insurance of $800 for four years for five dollars and twenty cents, or sixty cents on the $100 insurance.

The Company appears to be working truly on the Mutual principle, it rarely if ever occurred in Canada that the insured received back any portion of the money paid in to an insurance Company. May your success be still mor marked in the future.

Yours truly,
THOMAS MCBRIEN,

Of late there has been quite a stir in matrimonial circles. We guess it must be those cheap Wedding Rings that Wilcox, the Jeweller, sells that catches the "Boys."

W. F. Dall, of Flesherton, has just received a beautiful line of 10, 12 and 15k colored and Bright Gold Chains, Necklets, Lockets, &c., direct from the factory.

For No. 1 coal oil, CASTORINE and other machine oils, try Haskett Bros.

Mr. Gordon's "Young Netherby," will travel in the vicinity of Duncalk, Shelburne, Rosemont, Blackbank, &c., this season. He is a fine horse, and we doubt not but will be well patronized.

We feel assured that the many friends of Mr. Robert Gordon, of Dundalk, will regret to learn of the serious loss he has met with in the death of his fine heavy draught Stallion "England's Glory."

Our Devil say he is not partial to servant girls, beg their pardons, lady helps we should say. Upon waking up this morning he found a pair of old boots in his bed, and he hadn't been to Tom's or Sandy's either.

The "Canadian Serenaders" have commenced their concert season. At present their choruses are rather weak; but will gain in strength no doubt as the weather gets warmer.

Use "Castorine" Machine Oil, for all kinds of machinery, it is also excellent for harness and leather, making it water and weather proof. For sale by dealers.

Gardening is pretty well advanced, as far as laying out of the beds and planting is concerned, but vegetation is very backward. We expect to be able to announce that Cucumbers, New potatoes, &c., were offered for sale for the first time this season, about September next, if the heavy frosts at nights continue.

The "Boys" of our village say they do not intend letting Toronto have the only "Champion of the World." As they can't hope to excel on water, they have taken to foot-racing, and we expect shortly to see a challenge in the Mail for the Championship and $10,000 a side for a spurt of from one hundred yards to as many miles.

Neck Tie Social.—The Ladies' Aid Association of the Presbyterian Church of Markdale, intend having a Neck-Tie Social on Friday, the 13th inst., in Dufferin Hall. Stricken but True.—Alex. Irwin, Esq., a gentleman who resides a mile and a half from here, and was one of the first settlers, is now in his 83rd year, and has in the last six months two new teeth, and has another now cutting, which he informed us, is very annoying. He says he can sincerely sympathize with children teething.

On Saturday night last a Horse belonging to Rev. C. C. Garnett of this place got loose in the stable and by some means got the door open and rambled off. It was reported, and partly believed by the owner, that the beast had been stolen but he was agreeably disappointed on the Monday evening following when the Horse returned, somethe worse for his tramp.

The farmers in this neighborhood will have no lack of horses to choose from with which to improve their stock the coming season. For heavy draught purposes, Mr. Alex. McLoughry is on hand with "Heart of Oak. For general purposes, we have Palmer's "Montreal Champion;" Robert Freeborn's "True Young Briton;" Henry King's "British Ensign," (this last mentioned, although but rising three, is of good size, and as far as we can judge gives every indication of being a very fine animal). In the trotting and roadster line, Mr. J. K. Trimble has "Clear Grit to the fore. Now, gentlemen, you can pay your money and take your choice. We have given you their names, you can study up their pedegrees and other particulars by reading the bills.

GREY ASSIZES.

At the Assize Court, held in Owen Sound on Tuesday, the case of John Miller, of the township of Normandy, was tried. The case was one of alleged murder against Miller for killing his wife by driving over her with a team. At the investigation before the magistrates held in the village of Hanover, the evidence was of the usual circumstantial character, which, together with the general knowledge of the husband, and the wife's friends, and of domestic quarrels, led to the committal of the prisoner for trial. His Honour, after hearing the evidence on behalf of the Crown, thought it was not sufficiently strong to necessitate the calling of witnesses for the defence, and accordingly discharged the prisoner.

Julia Ann King, and James King, her son, of the township of Keppel, who were committed on a charge of murder by the Police Magistrate for having counselled, aided, and assisted Mary King to procure an abortion which resulted in her death, were today discharged by the Grand Jury, in whose opinion not sufficient evidence was adduced to warrant the case being proceeded with. The disposal of these has considerably lightened the criminal calendar, and it is expected the court will conclude its business tomorrow.

If rain does not come pretty soon, milk will have to be sold by dry measure.

A bad marriage is like an electric machine; it makes you dance, but you can't let go.

"Stockings, miss? what number?" —"Why, two, of course. Do you think I've got a wooden leg?"

We have no objection to a man borrowing trouble; but we want him to keep it to himself after he has borrowed it.

Nothing in this world yields larger and quicker returns on the amount invested, than poking a wasp with your finger to see if he feels well.

"I cant hold the baby any longer," said a young father, "it's getting too heavy."—"Pshaw, Edward! you used to hold me for hours and never complained."

It is probably that brigade camps will be formed at the following places this season, viz.:—No. 1 military district, at London; No. 2 military district, at Niagara; No. 5 district, taken in the Montreal corps, at Laprairie; and No. 6 embracing Quebec. The localities in Nos. 3 and 4 district have not yet been selected.

A girl ran away from home, and the father advertises her as "Laura, age 18, dressed in a straw hat." What a fix she'll be in if that hat should blow off.

A meeting was held at the Mansion House on Wednesday evening, to make further arrangements for the celebration of the Queen's Birthday. A Turner was elected secretary, and C. W. Rutledge Treasurer. A big day is expected, full particulars may be seen on Posters next week.

IMAGINARY EVILS.

Let to-morrow take care of to-morrow,
There's no use to anticipate fate;
There's no use to anticipate sorrow,—
Life's troubles come never too late.

If to hope over much be an error,
'Tis one that the wise have preferred:
And how often have hearts been in terror
Of evils that never occurred.

If thy faith is founded on life,
Then let life be your whole aim;
Live righteous, live meek and useful,
And like Socrates you'll rise to fame.

But this world lasts but only a day—
That is, for the giddy and vain;
Their pleasures are only but sorrows,
And vanish like wind on the main.

Then have faith and thy faith shall sustain thee,
Permit not suspicion and care
With invisible bonds to enchant thee,
But bear what God gives thee bear. to

By His spirit supported and gladdened,
Be ne'er by forebodings deterred,
But think how oft hearts have been saddened
By fear of what never occurred.

Let to-morrow take care of to-morrow.
Short and dark as our life may appear,
We may make it still darker by sorrow,
Still shorter by folly and fear.

Half our troubles are half our inventions,
And often from blessings conferred,
Have shrunk from the wild approbation
Of evils that never occurred.

HOW EARLY GARDENING PAID.

An incident never put in print, may afford a useful hint to many. While travelling through Eastern Iowa several years ago, we were taking lunch at a railway restaurant, when a man rushed up, saying he had heard of our passing, by a telegram the conductor had sent ahead, and urged our stopping over night to see his place, and give a talk to the farmers of the neighborhood. On being assured that an engagement in Illinois would prevent it, he fairly pulled us out on to the platform, and pointing to a fine place on an elevated position, with excellent buildings, etc., said, "your American Agriculturist gave me that splendid farm and home" A little startled at this, we had barely time to get a brief explanation before the train started, and even forgot to ask his name. It was as follows:

"Several years ago, you wrote that if any enterpising man living in the vicinity of a large village, or of two or three smaller ones, would manage to put his early peas, corn, beets, cucumbers, etc., etc., into market a week or two ahead of others, he could get two or three prices for the first offerings. That this could be done by selecting a warm, dry plot, by draining it well if needed, by putting in seed very early, and protecting with straw or other covering when cold nights or frosts threatened, after the plants were up And especially by the following plan: Have prepared a lot of pieces of sod, a foot square or so, if pretty well rotted and free from fresh grass roots, all the better, but not essential; moisten them with weakish liquid manure from the barn-yard. Into this, marked off into little squares of the size required by different plants, put peas, corn, etc., etc., one seed in a square. Place several rows of these sods along the south side of a board fence. Keep them sufficiently moist to sprout the seeds, and start the growth, using larger pieces for potatoes. In cold nights, cover with coarse cotton cloth, which may afterwards be bleached and cut up for family use; or have straw at hand to throw over when needed. When the warm, settled weather arrives, and the ground is all ready, with plenty of well-rotted manure worked in, cut the sods into squares, so that each piece will have a plant in it with two or three weeks growth already made. Put these pieces in the ground at proper distances; plants go right on with their growth, and thus much time may be gained in the maturity."

"I acted upon this advice, extending the operation largely; had my sods prepared in autumn, and well frozen in winter, and on a small area got seed enough started thus to plant over two acres. My early garden stuff was the town talk, brought in a heap of money, and in this way I was able to pay for that land, and get forehanded enough to put up those buildings, and I don't owe a cent. That's the way your paper gave me all you see up yonder"—and the moving train cut off the narrative—the last words we heard sounding like this: "I have competitors now, but I have enough else to do, and don't need to do so much with the early stuff."

FORWARDING MELONS AND OTHER PLANTS.

Probably every one who has a garden in the Northern States, wishes, for one reason or another, that the season had been a little longer. Melons, especially, are apt to be caught by the early frost, and the promise of a fine crop blighted. It is easy to lengthen the season, but it must be done at the first rather than the last end of it. This may readily be done by those who have hot-beds and cold frames, with which to forward the plants. This term "forward" is a convenient one, and is applied by gardeners to whatever hastens the ordinary growth. Melons and various other plants may be forwarded in the farm-garden at a very slight expense. That the sun warms the ground during the day is a well-understood fact, that this heat, or a portion of it, is lost during the night, is equally well known. Now, if a portion of the earth in which plants are growing be warmed during the day, and we prevent it from losing this heat during the night, it is evident that such plants will have a great advantage over those without such protection. All our melons, cucumbers, squashes, and other plants of that family, come from tropical or warm countries, and in order to yield the best returns in our northern gardens, need every advantage we can give them. Every one may not find it convenient to start his cucumber, melon, and similar seeds, on pieces of sod, or in pots, in a hot-bed or frame, but he may hasten, or forward the same in the open ground. All the expense or trouble required is, to make a lot of frames, one for each "hill," of six or eight-in. boards, and a foot square. It may be more convenient to get boxes from the store, at little or no cost. It makes no difference if the boxes are somewhat larger than the size named; the object is to get a box without top or bottom. Over such a box or frame, tack a piece of thin muslin or cotton cloth, and the thing is ready. Sow the seeds in the usual way, and every afternoon when the day begins to cool—soon after 3 o'clock, usually—turn these frames over the "hills." This will hasten the germination of the seeds, and when the plants come up, continue to protect them in this manner. If a cold windy day occurs, it will be better to leave these covers on than to expose the plants to the weather. This use of the covers or frames may be continued until the plants get too large for them. Not only plants thus treated be much ahead of those without such protection, but they will also be largely preserved from the attacks of the "striped bug" so injurious to melons, cucumbers, and related plants, especially when young. Of course the use of these requires some attention, and the leaving off of the covers during a chilly night may undo all that has been done; but gardening requires attention, and whoever has once used these or similar covers will not give them up.—American Agriculturist.

ORCHARD AND NURSERY.

Grafting is an operation that had better be done too late than too early. The best time is when the buds on the stock are swelling, and if necessary may be continued until the trees are in full bloom. At this season the bark slips readily, and much care will be required when sawing off a limb, not to make a bad wound by peeling down. This can be prevented in great part by cutting through the bark with a strong knife all round the limb where the saw is to go. Buds should be left upon the stock until the union of the graft is insured, which will be known by the buds on the graft starting into growth. After this rub off the buds upon the stock. The growth of the graft will need some attention; should but a single bud start, and push upward very rapidly, a long slender shoot will be produced, easily blown about by the wind and thereby loosened from the stock. All such will require checking by pinching off the top so that lateral branches may be formed. There seems to be a strong desire to give the trees the second place on the land, and put some other crop first. Those who do not care enough for an orchard to devote the land to it, should not plant one. Young trees, not yet in bearing, are not injured by having a hoed crop between them. But when the trees begin to bear a fair crop they deserve and should have all the soil. A clover crop to be fed off by pigs is the best thing for the orchard and for the pigs. This will enrich the soil, as the only thing removed is in the shape of flesh, while a large amount of vegetable matter in clover roots and manure is accumulated.

Insects.—An increase of insect pests will come with the warmer growing weather. The eggs of the Tent Caterpillar will be among the first to produce "worms," which, if left to themselves, will soon begin their ravages upon the foliage. Their coming is easily recognized by their "tents" and these should be destroyed at once. The best time to take them is early morning before they have left their nests or "tents," when the whole family may be removed and crushed. The bare hand is the best for all within reach; for those upon high branches use a pole with a swab dipped in ley or petroleum. If a newly set tree is found infested with Oyster-shell Bark Lice, it is the shortest way to pull it up and burn it. An old tree with this pest should be painted over with some non-drying oil, lard oil; crude petroleum has been used with some success. The presence of the Borers is known by the sawdust which they make. The best cure is a knife and a wire or a whalebone probe. Cut only enough to allow the entrance of the probe; never girdle the tree as we have seen some do who were hunting the borers. The Curculio of the plum stings the fruit when it is quite small. Jar the trees when the fruit is set in the early morning, and so long as the insects are caught. The sluggish beetles are caught upon sheets spread beneath the trees or arranged with poles to be held by two persons; put the insects into the fire or otherwise destroy them. Plant Lice, that sometmes crowd upon the growing tips of the cherry and other fruit trees, can be removed by syringing them with tobacco water; those within reach may be bent down, and dipped in the same juice.—American Agriculturist.

STARTING PLANTS EARLY.

A writer on gardening gives the following hints on starting tender seeds, such as tomatoes, squashes, melons, and the like: "It is desirable in transplanting not to check growth by disturbing the roots. A good way to avoid this is to scrape out turnips, fill them with good soil, and with two or three good seeds, setting them in a warm light place, and keeping them moist. When the weather is suitable, place them out in the garden at the proper depth; the turnip will decay. and the plant will thrive unchecked if properly cared for. Do not use potatoes instead of turnips. Another method is to get squares of sods, say six inches wide, from good, mellow soil, turn them bottom up, and put in such seeds as squash, or melon, or sweet corn, and treat them in the same way, not puting out til the weather is quite warm, and then protecting against bugs. For more delicate plants, flowers, etc., make little square paper boxes out of thin writing paper, or thick newspaper, merely folding them at the corners as you would a paper covering of a book, taking them with a needle and thread; make them about three inches square and two inches deep, fill with good soil, start the seeds and put out at proper time boxes and all, without disturbing the roots. If you fear the paper is too strong for the roots to penetrate, cut carefully on the bottom of the box the shape of a cross, and all will be well."
